

MOTIVES OF LIFE.

MOTIVES OF LIFE

BY ✓

DAVID SWING

||

NEW AND ENLARGED EDITION

CHICAGO
A. C. McCLURG AND COMPANY
1889

BJ1571
S<sup>a</sup>
1889

COPYRIGHT
BY JANSEN, MCCLURG AND CO.
A. D. 1879

COPYRIGHT
BY A. C. MCCLURG AND CO.
A. D. 1889

PREFACE.

---

By the title "Motives of Life," not all motives are implied. The things which move men, and should move them, are not so easily counted. The speech over them cannot be condensed into a small volume. Visiting a large forest in June, you cannot bear home with you all its great old trees; you may carry back only a few boughs from elm and oak. Unable to recall for young and old all the things that should create and bless labor, I bring here from the inner and outer worlds a few reminders of great duties and great rewards.

D. S.

CONTENTS.

---

	PAGE.
I. INTELLECTUAL PROGRESS, - - -	11
II. HOME, - - - - -	37
III. A GOOD NAME, - - - - -	63
IV. THE PURSUIT OF HAPPINESS, - - -	87
V. BENEVOLENCE, - - - - -	115
VI. RELIGION, - - - - -	139
VII. BEAUTY, - - - - -	165
VIII. THE CHRIST-MOTIVE - - - - -	191
IX. THE NEW IMAGINATION; A NEW IMPULSE OF LIFE, - - - - -	217

INTELLECTUAL PROGRESS.

MOTIVES OF LIFE.

---

I.

INTELLECTUAL PROGRESS.

IT has been inquired by metaphysical philosophers whether man is the powerless creature of external motives, or whether he possesses a will-power which may bid defiance to all things outside of self. Upon the replies to these questions depend other replies regarding human responsibility for conduct, and then upon these second replies depend certain third deductions touching punishment. Let us all be happy to commit such forms of thought to the Edwardses and Hamiltons and all the students of fate and free-will, and let it be our pleasure in all our days to confess that the mind is swayed by motives, just as the branches of a tree are bent by a wind. The most useful lessons of life are not those conclusions which by long and doubtful processes are reached by the intellects called "deep"—the Kants and Comptes and Lockes and Hamiltons—but rather those lessons which lie on the surface of society in the garb of every-day facts. We all know that there are external things which pull our minds this way and that; and we also feel that there is a personality within us which can resist or obey this outward entreaty. There are two sets of ideas all through nature—the phenomenal and the absolute. The sunrise, which we all so much love, is an apparent fact; the absolute fact is that the earth turns over. Philosophers tell us that the absolute color of the rose lies in its power to dissolve the rays of light and to reflect into our mind only one of many beams; but the phenomenal fact is that the rose is red, and further we think not and care not. There being thus two forms of fact, it is the phenomenal or apparent fact which we most love. We love the common, popular sunrise, and must leave to others the final philosophy of the event; and we all love the red rose, and must consign to the deep philosophers the last possible argument about that crimson blush.

---

---

With similar principles let us come to speak of motives of human life ; not as philosophers who seek a definition, but as friends who are anxious to talk together about making the best use of our allotted time. We do not desire an analysis of sunrise—we only wish to have the sun put in a daily and blessed appearance. We are all swayed by motives. As winds carry the thistle-down all the way over the Atlantic and plant in Canada the weed of Britain, so great winds take us up when we are children, and also when we are men and women, and transport us to far-away gardens of happiness or deserts of sorrow. Even great nations and great epochs have been driven along by some dominant impulse: the Persians and Arabians by pleasure, the Jews by religion, the Greeks by beauty, the Romans by conquest, the old Germans by war and wanderings. What is true of large groups of men is true of each heart; and here we are to-day, each one being drawn along over the hills and dales, by not the steeds which drew the sun, nor by the lions which drew the car of the haughty conquerors, but by never-abating motives many and powerful. These motives are many and changeable. There are changes for each hour. But from amid this endless variety there rise up a few large ones which for the most part rule the whole of life. As there are some mountains which overtop all others and some rivers which make other rivers seem but brooks, so there are motives whose excellence leaves them without any significant rival.

---

---

If you will look either outward upon society or inward upon self, you will find that the human soul is drawn along by the angels of good, or its boat is impelled by the winds—trade-winds—sweeping a large sea. Man is impelled by the desire of intellectual culture, by the motive called home, by considerations of fame, by the hope of pleasure, by love of mankind, and by religion. Education, home, fame, happiness, benevolence and religion, are the great motives of action and thought. Into each heart all these impulses should enter and abide. They should come to man in his youth and remain with him to the end. But such a group of motives is too large to be thought of in one hour. Let each one then claim an hour for itself. It seemed at first thought that these would be themes for the young, but instead of being thus limited they are themes for us all, for no one of us can live so long as to be beyond the charms of education, home, fame, happiness, benevolence and religion. There is no logical or chronological order for these motives. Each one of them is as long as life, and the order of treating them will simply be an order of convenience.

---

The first thought of shall be intellectual progress. To possess a cultivated mind, and to have some general knowledge of the world around us, both in its material and living kingdoms, is such a hunger of the soul that it may be called an instinct. There are tribes of savages so low in mental action that they have no desire to add to their stock of information. Their brains have never been sufficiently aroused to enable them to think. They have not the mental power that can frame a regret. Sir John Lubbock found tribes so stupid, so sleepy, that any remark he might make to them about Europe or America, about steamship, or telegraph, or railway, seemed to annoy them by disturbing their intellectual repose.

---

The distance between the uncivilized races and the civilized ones is almost like that between a walrus-oil lamp and the sun. The moment you pass into a civilized land, ancient or modern, the mind is seen to be awake, and to be hungry for ideas. "Give me knowledge or I shall die," has been the plaintive prayer of almost countless millions.

No doubt the human race has sought gold too ardently, and does so still, but we must not suffer that passion to conceal from us the fact that in all the many civilized centuries, this same race has with equal zeal asked the universe to tell man its secrets. We have been not only a money-seeking race, but we have been rather good children, and have studied hard the lessons on the page of science and art and history. If, when you look out and see millions rushing to and fro for money, you feel that man is an idolater, you can partly dispel the painful thought if you attempt to count the multitude who in that very hour are poring over books, or who in meditation are seeking the laws of the God of nature. Millions upon millions of the young and the old are in these days seeking at school or at home, in life's morn or noon or evening, the facts of history and science and art and religion. In order to be ourselves properly impelled or enticed along life's path, we must make no wrong estimate of the influences which are impelling mankind, for if we come to think that all are worshiping gold, we, too, despairing of all else, will soon degrade ourselves by bowing at the same altar. It is necessary for us always to be just. We must be fully conscious of the fact that there are many feet hurrying along through the places of barter, intent on more gold, but so must we be conscious that there is a vast army of young and old who are asking the great world to come and tell them its great experience, and to lead them through its literature and arts, and down the grand avenues of history. You saw the fortune, you read the will of the last millionaire when he died, but did you with equal zeal mark how our scholars hurried to the far West to study the last eclipse of the sun, and how a score of new sciences met on that mountain summit to ask the shadow to tell them something more about the star depths and the throne of the Almighty? When the Chaldean men of science attempted to learn the truths of the heavens, they were compelled to look up with the eye only. All they had was the eye and a loving heart. They filled seventy volumes with their imperfect studies. A comet they were compelled to designate as a star that carried a train behind and a crown in front. When the time of our late eclipse drew near, what a procession of arts and of instruments moved far out to where the shadow would fall! And others had marked just where the darkness would come and the second of its coming. As man can measure the width of a river, and find through what spaces it flows, so modern learning marked out that river of shade and built up its banks, and along came the brief night and flowed in them most carefully. But the astronomer went not alone; the science which can catch a picture in an instant; the science which can analyze a flame millions of miles distant, and tell what is being consumed; the science which can announce in a second a fall of heat; the science which can convey the true time two thousand miles while the excited heart beats once—these, and that grandest science which can see the rings of Saturn and the valleys of the Moon, assembled on that height in the very summer when we are lamenting most that mankind knows no pursuit except that of gold. That Rocky Mountain scene only faintly illustrates the intellectual activity of our era. If the passion for money is great in our day, it is also true that the intellectual power of the same period is equally colossal. No reader, be he ever so industrious, can keep pace with the issue of good books, and money itself is alarmed lest the new thoughts and invention of to-morrow may overthrow its investment of yesterday. Stocks tremble at the advance of intellect.

---

---

A glory of this intellectual passion may be found in the fact that it is not confined to a group of scholars, as old inquiry and education were confined, but like liberty and property, it has passed over to the many. Not all the multitude of the world are gold-seekers, but on the opposite there are tens of thousands of men, and women too, who are lovers of truth more than of money, and are standing by the fountains of knowledge with no thought or expectation of ever being rich. Education and knowledge, the power to think and to enjoy the thought of others, have long since transformed a cottage into a palace. Thus, although society seeks too fondly the money-prize, yet he will do great injustice to our land who fails to see what an immense motive of life this pursuit of knowledge has always been and remains. If then we would go through our years aright, we must not believe that the air around us is all poisonous with the incense burned to Mammon, but that there is also a sweetness in the wind coming from the altars where the millions of truth-lovers kneel.

The young are taught in our day that the gates of society open only when Money knocks, but from what part of society has passed before our observation we all see the utter falseness of such teaching, for when money opens her house and sends out her invitations, one always sees in the drawing-room the equality of all; lawyer and doctor and clergyman and actor and singer and inventor and artist, who have no hope of fortune and who have barely money enough to procure neat apparel ; and many of the invited and honored guests are so entirely free from fortune that they cannot even ride to the rich man's house in a carriage. You will find in all these assemblies given by the money-kings, welcome guests who have no virtues except education and good manners. And further, there is no large number of extremely rich persons in our land ; but there is a large multitude of those who have the means of a comfortable life, and with these all mental possessions rank as high as possessions of stocks and lands.

---

We thus must note that in the pursuit and possession of culture and information we see a life-motive, old and grand, and available to all. None are shut out and none are unblessed. In the earliest history of man this impulse began to make noble all who bowed to it. It took a blind singer of Greece and made him outlive kings; it made deathless Æsop who was only a slave, and the man who was a tinker and the boy who held horses at the door of the theater. It has ornamented whatever it has touched in all the long history of man. What it has always done it will always do, and no youth can look into good books for even only a few moments each day, and can take that habit with him into all his or her subsequent life without becoming transformed into a new likeness. For these few motives of which we are to think are but laws of the Almighty for human growth and happiness, and as he who breaks them is cursed, so the one who regards them is rewarded. When a man pursues money only, his features become narrowed; his eyes shrink and converge; his smile, when he has any, hardens; his language fails of poetry and ornament; his letters to a friend dwindle down to a telegraphic dispatch; he seems to have no time for anything, because his heart has only one thing for which it wishes time. What he calls the pressure of business is often only the want of any other pressure about the heart; but when the soul carries along with its gold-seeking a love of learning and all study, then the very face adds each year to its expressiveness, and the eyes and mouth and the marks on the face are taxed to the uttermost to express the noble soul dwelling within. As trees grow heaviest on the side where the light falls, so the face shapes itself to the light of the soul.

---

God made man in His image—so the Bible assures us. But we learn the deep meaning of that text by looking at the universe of the same God. We find that He made man capable of becoming an image of God. God did not make Adam a learned man, nor a poet, nor a painter, nor an orator, nor a statesman; but He made man capable of resembling the divine, and having done this He gave laws for this human ascent. And this scene of old Eden is repeated—the option is repeated to all who come into this garden of existence. To you in your cradle of twenty or thirty years ago, God came, and to you He still comes, with the whisper, “You may put on the image of deity.” He did not place you in that state, but He placed your cradle on its confines.

Is this motive of life really available to all? Is it not a bauble, except to persons of leisure or to members of the learned professions? Not at all; but on the opposite, it is one of the divine laws of all human being. All who assemble in these auditoriums, all who compose the modern public, not only may, but they must, make information and mental and spiritual development a ruling impulse and work of all these years. There are two forms of information. There is a technical study which belongs to those in a peculiar pursuit. You need not know as much about language as that

---

German knew who published a volume on two Greek particles; nor need we know as much about medicine and law and electricity as is known by the adepts in those sciences. But there is a large world—one of principles—a universe full of history and poetry and art and morals, in which not to walk at least a few steps daily is a form of sin against ourself and our Maker. The mind is not best developed by the details of the world's truth. The German who devoted his life to a study of the "dative case" made a sacrifice of himself for the benefit of all scholars and students. He beggared himself that others might be rich—that others could avoid such a waste of time. You and I need not work out a table of logarithms from 1 to 10,000, nor need we calculate interest-tables for all sums at all per cents, and for all numbers of days. A few men or a few machines can do this work for the entire human race for all future time. The study which pertains to us all and will bless all, is the study of those general and ever-changing facts which none can study for us, and which, if others should study them for us, would leave us miserable. The great truths of history, the outlines of all science, the riches of language, the inspiration of poetry, the thrilling careers of the heroes of liberty, of science and religion, the propositions of religion itself, the history of art ; all these shapes of learning just as truly invite you and me as the sea asks us to look upon its face, or the spring invites us to see its green leaves and feel its southern wind. As you would not appoint a committee of naturalists to go forth each day in May and see if spring was coming ; as you do not ask the gardener to tell you how the rose looks and how the violet smells, so you dare not ask any professional man, lawyer or physician or clergyman, to read for you the tablets where the historian and the poet and the prophet have sat down and engraved all the deeds and the emotions of the mightiest. No one can hear music for you; no one can love a child or a country or a June day for you; and thus no one can take your place in this gallery where hang the pictures of the living and dead nations, and where all the old eloquence still speaks.

---

The education of our common schools, even of our highest colleges, only prepares us for the study and meditation of the subsequent fifty years. There we all studied words—their roots, their grammar; there learned how to make words with a pen, and there the hundred details of reading, writing and arithmetic. The college simply adds Greek and Latin and German words and higher arithmetic, but the real information of the mind begins when after years have brought you to words as put together by Shakspeare and Dante and Carlyle and Macaulay, and by all the multitude of thinkers in science and morals. In school you learned how to write a thought, how to make the letters, how to spell the words; but then comes the real trial and pleasure of life, namely: to have a thought to be spelled and to be written. Thus the intellectual pursuit widens out after you leave the college, and grows larger as the years multiply the white hairs.

In intellectual pursuits, therefore, is found one of the lofty motives that are to impel us all along this seventy-year journey. It must belong to all, because all possess a mind and a soul. It asks only a half hour a day of time, and those half hours it exalts and expands, until at last their colors decorate the whole days and years in which they come. These half hours become like a drop of the attar of roses, which will soon lend to all the laces and ribbons of a Queen its enchanted air. These hours will lift even poverty from its complaint and foreboding, and will help the young and the old to resist the allurements of vice.

---

It is particularly essential in our times that all, even the men and women of middle life, continue or resume the daily communion with the best new wisdom of the age; for the world moves and changes so rapidly that the lessons we learned when young must be unlearned or revised, that they may be once more true and fresh and inspiring. If the church-going multitude will not read and will not place in the hands of their young men the best conclusions of the greatest Christian scholars as to the foundations of our faith and the essential Christian creed, they need not wonder if an eloquent public orator shall come along, and with his "Mistakes of Moses" make infidels of thousands who only a few years ago were full of the common Christian belief. The new studies of the non-believing must be met by the new studies of Christians. Each era must perform its own task. God has no more made arrangements for an indolent church than for an indolent science ; and hence as rapidly as the so-called infidel opens and criticises our books, we, the so-called faithful, must also open them to see if anything we said or our fathers said was partly true and partly false. There are hundreds of Christian scholars from Tholuck and Christ'ieb and Dean Stanley and Colenso to Dr. Ort and Dr. Knappert and the Presbyterian Professor Smith, whose most careful and devout studies will help place any thinking young man upon the rock of Christian faith. But the same youth, if supported only by the Christian theories of the past generation, cannot but fall at the first assault of the enemy. Neither we old men nor our young men can enjoy our faith or defend it by the conclusions and arguments of the past. It was the glory of Protestantism in the outset of its career that it espoused information and inquiry. It parted company with Rome because in Rome the Word was bound. All the modern churches came forth led by new studies and new conclusions; and now three hundred years have passed and the same Protestantism can win a new triumph by opening once more the study of the history and the doctrines of its divine religion. It can withdraw from its own errors as it once withdrew from the errors of Rome.

---

Among the motives of life that must urge us all onward, let us place the constant development of the mind and the daily accumulation of knowledge. This motive will blend perfectly with the motives of business and all pleasure. It displaces nothing of life's good, but many of its evils. It destroys idleness, it plucks the charm from vice, it quenches the thirst for riches, it brings us nearer to all times and nations, and binds by tender ties to all the noble living and to all the noble dead. As foreign and wide travel breaks up the local prejudices of the mind, and makes all the world seem to be the home of man and all the dwellers upon it to be brothers, so the long and wide reading of the world's truths beats down the walls of partition and transforms the reading, thinking one into a better friend and citizen and Christian. The late years, deserted of passion and beauty, are not lived by such a mind in superstition or darkness, but amid great pencils of light which are forerunners of a sunrise beyond the grave.

HOME.

II.

HOME.

AMONG the objects which have pulled long and hard at the heart-strings, one must hasten to class Home. It will be difficult to bring such a theme under a treatment of prose, and into any philosophic analysis, for it is a topic of so much sentiment and of such rich colors, that it has been by common consent assigned to the genius of poets, as being unthinkable except in the rhythm and drapery of verse. As the highly colored birds do not fly around in the dull, leaden plains of a sandy desert, but amid all the settings of nature's leaves and blossoms, and lights and shades—nature's framework of their picture—so there are truths which do not appear well in arid fields of philosophic inquiry, but which demand the colored air and the bowers of poetry to be the settings of their charms. As there is a condition of the heart which makes it scorn the tones of conversation, and urges it to break forth in song, so there are shapes of life which would gladly escape from the touch of prosaic styles, and ask justice from painter and poet. Home is one of these high-born ideas. It has always warned away Pulpit and Bar, and Bench and Tripod, and Desk and Platform, and has begged for the permission to be treated by a higher inspiration than these forms of speech can bring. And yet we must at times disregard this eternal fitness of things, and seek those facts about home which have made it so worthy of poetry and song. It might be that we are all being deceived by the singers of song and the weavers of poetry.

(37)

Home is a complex notion. It branches out like the springs of a river, and with its large and small tributaries covers a whole continent; or rather, it is a sun which lights up other worlds than itself. It throws its life-giving beams down upon the political planet and upon common industry and upon character and happiness. As a group of planets circle around our sun, and are all blessed by it and carried along through the Mays and Decembers of a million years, so around that star which mortals call "House," there move silently quite a group of such bodies as State and industry and happiness and character.

---

This fireside warmth, this light upon the hearth, shines upon industry and stimulates its growth and shapes its meaning. Almost all that war of trade which we hear in street; all this running of car and sailing of ship, arises from the breast of man while he is in pursuit of his home. The young men and the old men who shall pour forth into the street tomorrow to resume the daily task, will do so at the command of that idol of the heart called home. The captain who shall sail his ship, or who is now watching the compass in the high seas, will sail or watch at the bidding of that house or spot somewhere which he hopes to bless by his coming. Much of the world's hard toil goes into the taxes which sustain governments, and much of its earnings is trifled away and lost, but by far the greatest quantity of the money all toil after goes into the comfort and decoration of the home where the loved ones dwell. When the old buried cities were exhumed, what a light the uncovered walls shed upon that institution which is our theme to-day! The most of earth's ruins had been the ruins of temples and theatres and aqueducts and pyramids, because it was only those vast structures which contained the materials which could resist the action of time. The homes of the people, built of lighter substances, soon mingled with the dust, and left the great Past to whisper to us only of palaces for kings and temples of the gods; but when the volcano buried suddenly two cities, it embalmed in soft ashes the homes of the multitude, and bade them sleep two thousands years, and then rise up and tell us what a beautiful and powerful thing the home of man has been in all his civilized career. The marble floors, the painted walls, the playthings for the children, the lamps, the polished mirrors, the ornamented glass, tell us how busy were the fathers and husbands and brothers and wives and daughters, in that far-off time, all toiling to make and decorate and preserve the domestic roof. The temples, and viaducts, and pyramids are at last the most conspicuous ruins, but could the old homes all speak they would tell a dearer, more touching story than could be thundered forth by pyramid or Parthenon. Letters are extant from lawyers who toiled at their profession in the Roman Empire two thousand years ago; and one of these strong men confessed, when in exile for a time, that he could scarcely read a letter from home or write one to his home because of his tears. And to a friend in Greece the same toiler wrote: "If you see in Greece any piece of statuary that will ornament my library, buy it for me, even should it be expensive."

---

Thus at a glance we perceive that the vast industry of man does not gravitate about the word commerce, nor around the word money, nor around the word king or president, but around the word "home." Of all the multitude you will see to-morrow on the streets in the discharge of business duties, it is safe to affirm that the vast majority will be impelled by the love of a home that is or that is to be. Industry being the absolute salvation of man, how great is the influence of that circle which sends us forth each day to our work, and which renders the work pleasant because it is performed for the sake of the blessed fireside. The work of a slave must be emptied of pleasure because it is a toil which builds up the house of another and leaves the worker in poverty and despair ; but on the opposite, how sweet the toil of a freeman since all the hours of such industry go towards the home of to-day or to-morrow. The cottage with its half acre around it, with its few fruit trees, with its garden and its vines, is the poor man's savings bank, where his extra shillings take the form of a tree or a shrub or a new half-acre which no American or Scotch director can steal. Thus the idea of home branches out and includes the idea of industry within itself. Its light touches that star and makes it bright. It not only creates industry, but it gives it a noble purpose. And it does not demand enormous labors nor the accumulation of riches. Man can take any good and enlarge it into a curse. Man can take prayer or all religion and exaggerate it, until it becomes a deformity.

---

Man can go crazy after music. He can buy dogs until he is a half maniac, and he can travel the land over for fine horses, until in his mind the earth is only a pasture field—a turf for his steeds. And thus the love of a home may become degraded into only a mania for a house—a house that shall surpass all houses—a house born, not out of the home feeling, but out of rivalry and ambition. That home which makes up a God-ordained motive of life, and which has led the human heart captive in all ages, and which will lead the world captive until all shall go to Heaven, is one of the most accommodating ideas known to the heart. Home costs just what you may be able to pay easily. It adapts itself to your income. Unless it does this it will not be a home; it will be a perpetual care. If the income be large, then its walls may become marble and the grounds large, but if the means of the candidate for a home be small, then the grounds must diminish or else they must locate themselves outside of the city's limits, and the walls must become wood, and the decorations must all decline in cost, but not much in beauty. The home must be loaded, not with mortgages, but with vines; and inside must be human beings; not full of vanity, but who know what man is, and who know that rich and poor are all one in the absolute reality, and will soon be all one in the dust of the grave.

---

Our home idea having thus reached out to touch industry and property, it now reaches out and involves the idea of marriage. But nature does not deal in absolute universals. There are and have been persons who have found or are finding life's best mission in being homeless. There are persons who must go from place to place or almost dwell upon the sea. The home is not a universal necessity; and so marriage is not the destiny of all. It is a common or general goal, but not designed to be a universal shape of earthly pilgrimage. Hence the word "home" does not imply the marriage of all and everybody, for God's world has few laws that have no exceptions. All must die; all must breathe and eat; but soon the word "must" withdraws its despotism and the milder reign of "may" assumes the throne. Beautiful often are those homes where the son or the daughter, or the sons and daughters, live on in the parental house, helping the loved parents gently along the last years of this world, and where the orange blossoms never at last come. One dare not object to this, for nature is so full of exceptions that we cannot but feel that God meant that all forms of being should pervade our world and make it more beautiful by variations. As home is a general idea, so marriage can claim only to be a general custom. Toward this general custom the thoughts of home reach forth. Into the home, be it of thatch or of marble, this large friendship enters. The pictures and books and furniture, modern or antique, play but small part in the composition of the home compared with that companionship which exists between the souls within. Home depends wholly upon the oneness of all its inmates. If, when the father comes into the parlor the children gently slip out to be in some room where the father is not; or if, when the husband is present the wife is half afraid and is silent for fear speech may not be welcome to the greatness of the lord and master, home is there in only a modified and half-painful form. Fear of anybody is a good thing in jails and for criminals, but it is a poor element in a home. Oneness of heart from roof to cellar—a oneness which reaches even to the domestics—is the constitutional principle of the ideal home. It is most probable that such terms as “love at first sight” must be stricken from our modern philosophy, and that we must substitute for them “love for good reasons," and thus found homes, not upon a small hand or the grace of an attitude, or upon the genius of a Worth, but upon a most wonderful amount of good sense on each side of the interesting case. When marriages are formed upon a sudden fancy, divorce courts will always be busy, or else there will always be unhappy homes; for the suddenness of a romantic fancy is fully equalled by the suddenness with which it fades. Common sense alone will tell when a companionship has come which will bind two hearts together for life's good or ill. In presence of this common interest and inseparable attachment, the meaning of money and the meaning of brick and marble and frame, and plain and grand, are all one; these terms being rendered insignificant by the overshadowing worth of the friendship.

---

---

It is alleged that the modern girl candidate for marriage has her ideas of house and contents pitched to such a height that the young man of ordinary income and ordinary prospects cannot undertake to carry forward the same high tone of this life-music; but all we older persons have observed that the daughters who possess most education and most intellect are perfectly willing to start their enterprise in a plain way. They not only are willing, but they glory in it. They only ask that their companion be a man of industry and refinement and good sense. As for those who are called the "butterflies of fashion," and there are male individuals of this species, no provision need be made for ever bringing them to a marriage altar. They should be omitted from all inquiries as to the great motives of life. It is said that John Bunyan's wife brought him not so much as a fork or a knife or a spoon, but only herself and two good books; but it afterwards appeared that she was herself a complete world without the silver spoon accompaniment.

---

But we must move away from this uncertain ground to repeat that man's home rises up before the human race as one of the powerful winds that fills the sails and wafts along the ships. How the heart almost breaks when it must leave home ! Not only the little children but all we older children are compelled to shed secretly a few tears when we must leave for a time the indescribable charm. Strong-hearted and strong-minded men feel that to fly over to the old continent and ramble there a half year will be a supreme delight, but when the wheels of the steamship make their first revolution and the friends on the shore wave adieu, how the heart sinks and how the whole physical frame protests against the great separation ! And amid all the wonders of the foreign world, the home left behind pulls at the heart of the exile, and at times comes the feeling of regret that even for all this pageantry of ruins and art, one should have left that fireside more divine than pictured wall or sculptured rock.

---

In the night a song comes over the deep—

Come home ;
Come to the hearth-stone of thy earlier days ;
Come to the ark, like the o'er-wearied dove ;
Come to the sunlight of the hearts' warm rays
Come to the fireside circle of thy love.
Brother, come home.

Come home ;
It is not home without thee ; the lone seat
Is still unclaimed where thou was wont to be ;
In every echo of returning feet,
In vain we list for what should herald thee.
Brother, come home.

And thus has the whole world thought and wept and cried in all its touching history.

This house, cottage or palace, with its attached inmates, reaches out and sustains powerful relations to the State. It is one of the marvels of history that such a genius as was that classic who defined an ideal republic should have declared that all the citizens should belong not to any family but to the State, and that all the children should be reared by the State in public buildings. Thus the term, father and mother, son and daughter, husband and wife, were all to be swallowed up in the word citizen. In a nation that must live by war, only such a theory might claim to be not wholly insane, but all the latter ages have made the notion one of the wildest ever entertained, for it is now seen that each great nation comes from the number and intelligence of its home-groups of men and women. It has always been the homeless rabble that has opposed the law and order of the world. And it has always been the men who had homes to defend and bless, who have toiled to check tyranny and establish liberty. That cot in the valley, that log house in the woods, that modest house in the village, those costlier residences in the city which so pull at the heart when the inmate leaves them; these all pull at the soul, too, in days of political conflict, and have turned out for battle long lines of heroic troops. Home surpasses West Point in training for the battle-field; for if the latter can supply an art, the former can supply an inspiration more effective than tactics. According to Macaulay's Lays of Ancient Rome, and indeed according to plain history, a most despotic monster was swept from power in a few days by a people who saw him lay his armed hand upon the home of a most humble citizen. That whole poem of Virginia may well stand forever as an expression of the relation between the Throne and the Home. And in our day this relationship has become still more intimate, for the Throne has abdicated many old rights, and the Home has put on increased education, and has been granted new prerogatives. The old despot has faded away into a citizen-king or queen or president, and the power thus cast aside has been assumed by the fireside.

---

Against the madness of a mob our land can always oppose the interest and power of its domestic hearth. In olden times the homeless, made such by despotism and by ignorance and by superstition and idleness, were a multitude so numerous that upon almost any day they could overthrow or disturb the government; but for a hundred years our land has been removing the chains of ignorance, and superstition and idleness, and has been gathering into homes millions who in other ages would have been either a turbulent mob or the armed troops of a despot. Thus that home which figures first in romance as a place which love builds, and then figures in poetry as the dearest spot on earth—from which going we weep tears of sorrow—to which returning we weep tears of joy, passes up out of this sentimental vale and re-appears in politics more inspiring than many drums, more powerful than a tyrant's sword.

Only allusion can be made to the qualities of this potential motive. It is seen to branch out and touch industry, and awake and direct it; to touch marriage and invite it, and lay plans for its life-long happiness; and then to touch the great affairs of State and become an ally of a good king or a good president. So it reaches out once more and touches intellect and heart with its almost angelic wings. In the peace and security and happiness of this abode, and under its impulse toward industry the intellect is awakened and the heart is led out of itself. Some great minds may have been reared in a closet, and from a garret addressed a world, but such events are exceptional. Almost all those minds which have stood forth in beauty, and which still stand in history never to fade, arose not from the dens of any isolation, but from the fireside of a home. It took all the cares of domestic life, it took the wife and all the children, to weave the immortal chaplets of the central figure. The group kept the soul and mind bound down to the daily task, and made the task most pleasurable. Read over the names of the mighty ones, and what a vast majority of them were kept fully awake to the outside world by the restless life under the parental roof. In isolation the heart grows narrow, and the mind declines toward repose, and its sun sets soon, after a bad day. It is evidently the law of God that in early life along shall come the cottage or the mansion to pour a new inspiration into that soul from which the first visions of youth have faded. A public man now in the latter years of a long life wrote recently in a private letter: "I love the world more and my heart grows tenderer toward it the longer I live. I love the young deeply and feel that I am myself still down among their laughter, and pleasures and hopes." Now this letter comes from a home where the light of affection has joined with the sun in lighting up door-step and window, and where a modest library and a generous fire in the broad fire-place have combined with kindred spirits to make the place a source of a pure thought and a pure religion and an unfading youth. What else could so influence the better thought and sentiments?

---

---

It would be well to ask you to mark the relation of the home idea to morals, but the subject has proven too large for the hour. We will always, all of us, fail to grasp these great motives which envelop us. As we cannot conceive of God, so must we fail to measure fully these majestic expressions of His will His ways are above our ways. We can only each day take a few steps along His infinite shore. As one of the greatest of modern nations, unable to behold all the magnificence of the old empire of the Nile—unable to collect again the immense libraries of the Pharoahs; unable to restore the massive architecture which reached from Thebes to Memphis; unable to remove to London a pyramid—could only box up a single monolith and drag that little emblem across the seas—so must we all at last confess weakness in presence of the motives which God has been building up in the thousand-year periods, and along the stream of human being. Unable to measure the length and breadth and sublimity of all or even one influence, we have chosen only a single stone—a monolith from an empire that demands our widest and deepest study.

You need no extended advice, but only the hope that the young men of to-day will not undertake to pass these earthly years without asking the ideal home with its impulses to come and lead and impel them by its many-shaped attractiveness. Towards that future home direct the industry and economy of the present. The mind in its thought, the hand in its skill, the heart in its morals and warmth, the spirit in its religion, ask you to be busy to-day laying the foundations of this human temple, rivaling in beauty the halls of art and even the shrines of God; and your coming middle life and old age ask you to prepare for them its happiness and peace. Do not fear to picture it as rising up in years not far away, for the heart will decorate the morrow with something, and no other sketch will more honor the canvas or be more easy of final fulfillment; but paint it in simplicity. Let it begin softly, like a strain of music, that there may be room for higher notes further along in the great rhapsody. God will go with you, for He loves not more the altars of Himself than the firesides of His children.

---

A GOOD NAME.

III.

A GOOD NAME.

AMONG the motives which most influence mankind is included the winning of a name. From the fact that each heart loves itself follows the fact that each heart seeks also the esteem of others. The longing for a good name is one of those laws of nature that were passed for the soul and written down within to urge toward a life of action, and away from small or wicked action. So large is this passion that it is set forth in poetic thought, as having a temple grand as that of Jupiter or Minerva, and up whose marble steps all noble minds struggle—the temple of Fame.

The Creator of man, in an infinite wisdom and kindness, has placed in the breast a group of incentives to large and constant action, that by these infancy may be rapidly changed into manhood, and manhood be continually resolved into a yet nobler form ; and that by the aggregate of these individual movements barbarism may be lifted up into civilization, and civilization be perpetually raised to a higher degree. Civilization is only the aggregate of individual careers, and hence those impulses which lead the mind to seek education and a home and a name and happiness and a God, at the same time form a civilization which may retain for centuries those results which lingered only a few years with the individual. Civilization is the ocean of which the millions of individuals are the rivers and torrents. These rivers and torrents swell with those rains of money and home and fame and happiness, and then fall and run almost dry, but the ocean of civilization has gathered up all these waters, and holds them in sparkling beauty for all subsequent use. Therefore all those great billowy seas which we call Greece or France or England or America, are places where the pursuit of property and fame and learning and happiness by the millions, has emptied their floods for a score of generations. Civilization is a fertile delta made by the drifting souls of men.

---

The word "fame" never signifies simply notoriety. It implies only an honorable notoriety. The meaning of the direct term may be seen from its negation or opposite, for only the meanest of men are called infamous. They are utterly without fame, utterly nameless; but if fame implied only notoriety then infamous would possess no marked significance. Coming from the Greek phami and the Latin fama the word signifies that the public is speaking about your merits. Men meeting in the streets are asking each other if they have seen your elegant statue or painting, or have read your poems, or have seen your kindness to the poor, or have marked your patriotism or honesty or piety. The term thus implies that the public is confessing some honorable act of your life or skill of your hand or quality of your heart.

It is amazing that so many great men have spoken so sneeringly of this innate impulse. Colton says: "Fame is an undertaker that pays but little attention to the living, but who bedizens the dead, furnishes out their funerals and follows them to the grave." Johnson and Young and Byron and Pope and a large group of such authors shot their pointed arrows at this divinity and broke down the doors and altars of her temple; but it must be that all these were looking only at the extreme longing for notoriety which has marked some careers, and burned up and ruined many minds. It is known that Byron and Young so courted public applause that they helped associate in men's minds ambition and madness. When we look at Alexander and Herod and Cæsar and perhaps Napoleon, and mark how in their histories fame became associated with innocent blood, the motive seems to fall from our touch and we desire to say nothing more in its defense. But the great motives of life cannot be measured in a few exceptional hearts. We cannot learn from a miser nor from a Cræsus the worth of the human pursuit of property; nor can we learn from a fanatic the worth of a religion; but from these exceptions we must escape, and go to the human race and there find the value of the human love of money and the worth of the general tenets of religion.

---

So in studying that life-motive which is called a "good name," we must turn away from the life of Alexander or Herod or Xerxes, and ask the large human race to tell us the high merit of this spiritual longing. We need not seek to know the value of that blare of bugles which may have greeted an Africanus who had ruined a Carthage; or the market value of the popular breath which cried out before a robed king—"He is a god!"—but we wish rather to read the gentle words of the sage, who said long centuries ago that "a good name was rather to be chosen than great riches." Other sages have said as much. Solon said that "He that will sell his good name will sell the State." Socrates said, "Fame is the perfume of heroic deeds." Our Shakspeare said, "He lives in fame who died in virtue's cause." Such words as these may well expel from our memory the contempt expressed by Byron and Young, and bring us to the conclusion that in the pursuit of an honorable name lies one of the God-ordained incentives of human conduct.

Our theme is most practical. Our age is deeply influenced by the motives called property and home and pleasure, but it is a question whether the generation in action to-day and the generation on the threshold of this intense life are conscious fully of the worth of an honorable name. It is impossible, as is thus always confessed, to compare together to-day and yesterday, and say that yesterday had more virtue or more vice; and the same confession must be made over the influence of a good reputation upon the men of yesterday and the men of to-day. It is not known whether with us all a good name is less sweet than it was with our fathers, but this is painfully evident, that our times do not yet sufficiently behold the beauty of character—their sense does not detect quickly enough, or love deeply enough this aroma of heroic deeds. It is amazing what multitudes there are who are willing to sell out their reputation, and amazing at what a low price they will make the painful exchange. Some king remarked that he would not tell a lie for any reward less than an empire. It is not uncommon in our world for a man to sell out all his honor and hopes for a score or a half score of dollars. Within a week two young men in the glory of twenty-one years, have become murderers for a few dollars. In one case it was simply hoped, not known, that the victim had a hundred dollars; and for this little sum the young man of fair fame turned friendship into an accomplice, asked pleasant conversation and a walk through the fields on a beautiful moonlit night, to help him kill a trusting companion. Our prisons are all full to overflowing of those who took no thought of honor. They have not waited for an empire to be offered them before they would violate the sacred rights of man, but many of them have even murdered for a cause that would not have justified even an exchange of words. There lies in our jail now a young physician who for a few cents killed the loved father of a family, and thus in one moment brought infinite sorrow to the two homes—the hearth of the slayer and the hearth of the victim, and measureless infamy to himself. Of this our age is too full. Whether some new influence has come to cloud the value of personal character, or whether the human race has always thus failed to read the laws of happiness, one may not tell; but this we must perceive: that our land is not yet conscious of the height and depth of that happiness that comes from a spotless reputation, and the depth of that misery which comes from this honor lost.

---

---

One of the most striking instances of this awful folly—the flinging away of honor—comes to our mind now when we recall a person who for a handful of money terminated all his many friendships, and his friends were many, and kind were they and true. His wife was the most beautiful being the great West could send up to a bridal altar, and as amiable as beautiful. Her life, her premature death, the sacredness of her grave and her child—all friends and all these memories weighed nothing, and nothing was the weight he placed upon his own good name. All these sacred things he threw away to be a rich thief under a false name in a foreign land. So fearful is the price he has paid for his gold that it does not now seem that any arrest and trial and an imprisonment, even for life, could add anything to the bitterness of his cup. His hell began with his flight.

If these painful events came only one to a generation we should say they were the result of insanity; but they come in such startling rapidity that they must be confessed to spring up out of an age that does not study enough the worth of reputation—which expects of money alone a happiness it can never bring.

There are some departments of human activity where the influence of a good name seems to be acquiring new power. In no age have literary genius and character appeared in closer alliance. A large majority of the English and American thinkers wear whiter raiment than clothed the souls of literary men in former times. The difference here is so large as to be visible. You may mention these noble names by the hour without coming to many which are tarnished. Macaulay and Carlyle and Wordsworth and Tennyson and Disraeli and Gladstone and Mrs. Browning and Ruskin and a hundred compeers; and on this side the sea, Bryant and Longfellow and Whittier and Emerson and the Carys and their compeers, join in showing that there is one class of living workmen who feel the necessity and glory of uniting in one soul genius and honor. Almost a hundred and fifty gifted poetic writers have become famous in England in the last forty years; and no former era ever bound together so much talent and so much honor. It may be that there is something in literature which invites the heart towards a self-control and a moral development, and that by their calling its votaries hold an advantage over the men who open banks or buy wheat or mingle in politics. If so we can bless God that earth has some green islands in its Saharas, and that our youth can escape the poison of too many commercial columns by turning to a literature composed of a higher order of thought.

---

The Bench of the current times seems as pure as the closet of literature. It has been the happiness of the Bar and of the Press to congratulate the times over the fact that the judges in the higher courts, East and West, seem to draw their decisions from the law and the evidence; and that whereas one age was happy in the possession of one honest judge—Matthew Hale—our country is happy in the possession of many such administrators of justice. More and more for a generation or two have educated men in literature and in the professions sought to combine with their mental gifts and their position the fame of integrity.

---

It will be perhaps the quality of the future that what the present now demands of the Bench and of its historians and poets and essayists, it will demand of its business men—that their names shall be like those of the Whittiers and Emersons, ennobled by integrity. Fame is a gold-field which has not been fully uncovered.

Were we to make a complete study of the career of honor, we should find some strange facts scattered here and there in its history. We should find little spaces of time when honor was more popular than fine houses or fine furniture. We should find a brief Roman period when the citizen gloried in his good name more than in his genius or physical powers. We should find a period when slaves were emancipated when they had reached a certain established excellence of character. (Lecky is the authority.) And then we should come to spots of place and time where each man became a hypocrite, and when a Seneca dared in a fearful manner to combine crime and religious philosophy. These would always be the dying hours—the death-chambers of the unhappy periods.

In such a study we find that rewards must be offered for a good name just as they are offered for eloquence or genius or riches. If integrity were made the pride of the government, the love of it would soon spring up among the people. If all fraudulent men should go straight to jail, pitilessly, and if all the most rigid characters were sought out for all political and commercial offices, there would soon come a popular honesty just as there has come a love of reading or of art. It is with character as with any new article—the difficulty lies in its first introduction. Our steam-boat, our gaslight, began in much tribulation. It was difficult for any good music to get into a Scotch church. It took a hundred years to get the organ into the Presbyterian churches of Pennsylvania. Many elders and deacons withdrew rather than imperil their souls by hearing such music. It will prove more difficult to get the music of a good name introduced into our streets, and schools and homes; but once there we shall perhaps be slow in going back to the horrid discord of the former period. That this new virtue may come into favor, all our high rewards, those from the ballot-box, those from employers of tens and of hundreds, the rewards of society, the rewards of the press, should be offered only to the worthy. A few years of rewarding the worthy would result in a wonderful zeal in the young to build up, not physical property, but mental and spiritual worth.

---

An actor having been asked a few weeks ago if there was not at present an unusual number of actors and actresses who were seen to possess real moral excellence, replied that there was, and gave this as a reason: "That in former times the church gave them no hope of having any goodness acknowledged; the condemnation was perfectly sweeping; but that of late years the community had become so much more just, that now an actor or actress enjoys the full hope and knowledge that the world will give them credit for every excellence of character." They see before them the same moral possibilities that lie before a scholar or a statesman or a lawyer. Thus, as rapidly as the world becomes just enough, and itself holy enough to appreciate and reward the good name, lo! out of this demand and this justice comes a new supply—the various avocations saying, "If you really appreciate good men and good women, then here we are! Your love has encouraged us to come."

But let us pass from the value of a good name to the bearer, to mark for a moment its value to all who surround it. Fame in all its shapes—fame for invention or for poetry, or for eloquence, or for honesty, or for kindness, blesses not only its possessor but all the surrounding throng. It does not shut itself up in the little closet of one heart, but like the perfume of a violet, it hastens to get out of the little cup and scent the great air. No young man or young woman can by industry and care reach an eminence in study or art or character without blessing the entire family group. We have all seen that the father and mother feel that all life's care and labor were at last perfectly rewarded in the success of their child. But had the child been reckless or indolent, all this domestic joy—the joy of a large group—would have been blighted forever. Some of the touching episodes in history are accounts of those hours when a Christine Nilsson went back to her humble home, carrying to a cottage the triumphs of her song; and when a Macaulay's work began to quicken the heart-beats of those looking to him, not simply for support, but for happiness. There have been triumphs at old Rome, where victors marched along with many a chariot, many an elephant, and many spoils of the East; and in all times money has been lavished in the efforts of States to tell their pleasure in the name of some general; but more numerous and widespread and beyond expression, by chariot or cannon or drum, have been those triumphal hours when some son or daughter has returned to the parental hearth beautiful in the wreaths of some confessed excellence. Even if fame emptied all its good in only one heart—in its possessor's heart—it would be a most sacred impulse, for spiritual peace and joy are not so plentiful in this world that you and I can afford to throw them away or neglect the sources from which they come; but when to this consideration we add the fact that all personal goodness immediately passes out of self and settles down like a sunshine upon whole fields of human life, the obligations of an industrious and ambitious and moral career become solemn and yet sweet.

---

---

When certain mockers have made sport of fame, they must have forgotten what treasures the world has drawn out of this mighty impulse. We all know of the quarrels that have grown out of ambition. The papers tell us that the singers quarrel; and that the painters differ, and often pettishly break friendship; but we remember that men and women are only children; and when we remember that Paul and Barnabas were jealous of each other and separated, and that out of their ambition there grew up a powerful religion; when we remember that Angelo and Raphael and Bramante quarreled long and hotly, and that yet out of their ambition grew the most magnificent period of art, we prefer to endure the quarrels if we can have the final blessings of their ambition.

A quarrel is the childish thing of an hour, but the ambition of a Paul or an Angelo or an Isaac Newton, is the blessing of all subsequent times. Castelar said of Bramante and Angelo "that their names driven apart in the small days of strife were now reconciled in immortality." Mankind will forgive you all many childish words and deeds if only they can see that your ambition is bringing to science some new truth, to discovery some new machine, to character some new charm, and thus to humanity some new happiness

Let us sum up now the study of the hour. Do we not reach these conclusions: that a name for honor and wisdom, or for honor and art, or for honor and invention, or for honor and genius, is more to be desired than all outward possessions? We looked at the utter wretchedness of the men who threw away reputation, and would rather be rich criminals in exile than be loved friends and persons at home. We have noted how proud mankind is becoming of honorable scholars and judges and honorable business men. We found that our age must build up reputation by hastening to reward it. We then saw that fame passes out of self and blesses first the father's heart and the mother's heart, and then it flies out upon the broad world to be like a Christ, who moved away from a manger to dwell near all thrones and homes. It remains that you, ye young and ye old, cannot afford to bear the burden of an empty or an evil name. A good name is a motive of life. It is a reason for that great encampment we call existence. While you are building the home of to-morrow, build up also that kind of soul that can sleep sweetly on home's pillow, and can feel that God is not near as an avenger of wrong, but as the Father not only of the verdure and the seasons, but of you.

---

THE PURSUIT OF HAPPINESS.

IV.

THE PURSUIT OF HAPPINESS.

ALL pursuits are pursuits of happiness. The young men who are standing in presence of a group of professions, try to select one which will yield them not only a support but also the most of happiness. No man will of his own accord select an avocation against which his heart recoils. So universally does man seek personal happiness, and so widely does society in its organized forms seek this destination, that many philosophers have declared happiness to be the final motive of all conduct—that all other motives are but shapes of this one all-prevailing influence. It is indeed true that no act of life can be found in which this reward of being may not be seen as a possible motive, or at least as an expectation, but that all acts are done from considerations of the final welfare of the doer may well be denied, for without very clear proof we should not make man a creature of only self-interest. It is evident that all good conduct and all good character are inevitably joined with that result called happiness, and this is perhaps as far as the common mind can see in this direction in the spiritual world.

While philosophers are ardently and almost vainly attempting to learn whether all actions and all virtue are to be explained by the influence of this one pursuit, this truth remains for the common public, namely: that the pursuit of happiness, enjoyment, pleasure, is one of the most immense chases in which the human multitude ever joins. There are some who do not seek riches—perhaps because they were born into an old wealth which in generations has not increased nor diminished, or perhaps because they were born so poor that the thought of riches is a hopeless dream—and there are persons who do not seek a home, or a name or culture; but persons who do not seek pleasure one can with difficulty discover. This crusade is one in which all join and march to this music in front of the mighty procession.

---

Not every single individual of the human family has marched to this music, but no one shape of motive has come so near making a unit in one particular of the races and epochs of man. The history of the exceptions, could we find them and read them, would reveal to us only more clearly the fact that the Creator designed that all his creatures should seek, to a greater or less degree, personal pleasure. At least those who have attempted to shun the smiles and laughter and joys of earth, have found their method to be, not a form of development but a blight. In almost all histories of old lands we find a band of asceticism or stoicism drawn across the great page—a black line in this wide spectrum. Some disappointed priest of some god, or some baffled politician, or some baffled lover, or some unbalanced brain, has gone out from almost every state of the past, and in some desert has founded an order and a philosophy, whose cardinal idea has been that man should mortify all his feelings and look upon all pleasure as a weakness. Before our era came with its Christian hermits, old India and Arabia, and the Nile Valley, poured forth these streams of monasticism. The Eremite was a man who fled from civilization and took to the desert (eremos, a desert), that he might escape pleasure. But even these the inborn love of happiness followed, for when one of these had made his cell or lodge in the bleak sand or rocks, he soon managed to have company, and thus soon a hundred or a thousand hermits assembled in one valley or mountain or plain, that they who scorned all pleasure might have the pleasure of companionship. Although they ate in perfect silence and with faces unrelieved for years by a smile, and ate only little bread and oil and salt, and sat on a little bunch of straw by day, which bundle became a pillow at night, yet they wished the pleasure of society and always located in such a manner that each could see some companions of the common misery. In India, where the most miserable self-torturers exist, these seekers of suffering go in groups that they may have the pleasure of the company of each other. Thus these sets of men who have set forth with the cardinal doctrine of denying self, have hastened to gratify self by demanding the presence of companions. Thus has asceticism failed to root out from the heart the motive of happiness, because where it has vowed to be miserable it has asked the pleasure of companions in the distress, it asked the happiness of being seen.

---

When this eccentricity of human nature passed over from the Pagan to the Christian world, it could not by any effort become a perfect self-denial, for the recluses, the hermits and the monks, all betrayed points at which they wanted happiness to come in, and so rapidly did these points multiply and enlarge, that at last a monastery became a place where there was plenty of good food and good wine and good hearty laughter. To be fat and jolly as a monk became the quality at last of those orders whose founders had left the world that the body and soul might escape its sensual pleasures. Thus so stubborn is the natural law of pleasure that men who have set forth to oppose it have been found at last fatter and redder of face and jollier than those who remained away from this contest with the flesh and the devil.

In so far as individuals have succeeded in overcoming the smile and joy of earth, to that distance have they also blighted the other natural powers of the soul. In the effort to overthrow pleasure, these men have dragged down all else. The mind hastens to pass into a stupor when it has become convinced that there is nothing around it worth living for. The more the ascetic—be he Pagan or Christian, be he Stoic or a Fakir or a Monk—limits the horizon of pleasure in the best sense of that word, the more he limits the out-reachings of the mind and heart, and contracts the powers and works of his life. A suicide is a man whose heart has become perfectly emptied of joy and the hope of it ; and next to the suicide stands the ascetic, who holds the theory of the suicide but in a less real form ; he has the faith or creed of the suicide, but has not yet risen to his practice.

---

A classic orator once spoke so powerfully about the worthlessness of human existence that his addresses were always followed by a sudden increase of suicides. We who from our happier era look back, cannot but feel that the hatred some of our ancestors cherished for pleasure, made the world seem so small and ill-deserving that they did not care to extend toward it their esteem or their charity. From the years which they had sown broadcast with their hatred of laughter, they reaped a harvest of indifference and coldness of soul. It mattered little to them how much their neighbor or their enemy suffered, for suffering was a dignified condition of body and mind, and was not half so weak a thing as loud enjoyment. If this stoicism enabled some men to be martyrs and to sing songs at the stake, it also made them willing to make martyrs of others and to sing cheerfully at the burning of other bodies than their own. If asceticism had but one side to it—the ability to endure ills—it might pass for a virtue; but it has always another side: the power to inflict ills—a vice for which a willingness to have one's thumb twisted or right hand burned is an inadequate compensation. Thus the heroism of Cranmer and More and Knox, had its dark side, for the severity of philosophy which enabled them to endure well, made them equally powerful to inflict. The power to repel happiness has been too often joined to the inability to care for the happiness of others. It is no doubt true that some of the iron-hearted men in the past did great good in their day, but one may well be glad that their day has passed by, and that with the passing away of the men who could hold their hand in a blaze until it were consumed have passed away; also the men who could without flinching hold in the same blaze the hands of other people. Let us have, instead of iron-men, souls sensitive to joy and pain, for these only can measure fully the joy and pain of another. A sensibility to one's own happiness is pre-requisite to a conception of the happiness of others. How can man be anxious to bestow upon another that of which he himself knows but little? No doubt the poet Milton possessed immense learning and immense powers and heroism; but if story be true, his daughters, who are pictured as reading so affectionately to their blind father and the nephews about the Miltonian home, must have had often convincing proof that their Paradise at least had been long lost. Much of the prose of Milton is marked by a ferocity of which our times can furnish no parallel. Having but one life to live, and having the choice of all times, one would be justified in locating his span of existence in a happiness-seeking age, for only such an age would care for your tears and make any effort to dry them. Iron-men are noble to bear, but hard to be borne.

---

When Christianity has in any way been made into a severe state or philosophy or character, this bad result has been achieved by a wandering away from Christ and by a linking together of Mosaic law and Christian gospel. When our ancestors condemned and executed witches, they quoted Exodus 22: 18, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live." When the Christian Church began to put to death all those who rejected its line of belief, it studied and imitated the example of Moses and Joshua in their extermination of the Canaanites. The early Christian Church studied, not its Founder, Christ, but its imaginary predecessor, the Mosaic Church, and put to death millions of non-believers because the Mosaic model had cut down the Pagans root and branch. Many of these olden-time writers explain persecution by quoting from Deuteronomy. One of them, Simancas, says that persecution to Death is right, because in the 17th chapter of Deuteronomy we are told that stubborn unbelievers must be burned in sight of all the people, and that idolators must be led outside the gates and there be stoned to death. Our own ancestors, when they made the penal code of Connecticut, founded it as far as possible upon the Pentateuch. Again and again at the end of a law they cite the holy precedent for such an act of legislation. For example, we find on the Code this Blue Law: "If any child or children about sixteen years old and of sufficient understanding, shall curse or smite their natural father or mother, he or they shall be put to death. See Exodus 21 : 17 ; Lev. 20 : 9 ; Ex. 21 : 15." Again, "If a man have a stubborn son who will not obey the voice of his father or mother, and that when they shall have chastized him he will not hearken unto them, then shall they bring him before the magistrate and testify that their son is stubborn and rebellious, and will not obey their voice and chastisement, but lives in sundry and notorious crimes, such a son shall be put to death. See Deut. 21 : 20." You may study all you will and can the alleged cruelty of Christianity, and you will find it all to have come from the assumption that Moses brought the perpetual will of God to earth, and that Christ and Moses were linked in an equal and everlasting partnership. Out of this assumption has come an endless amount of cruelty and blood and tears and sorrow. But the moment you dissolve this terrible companionship between the thunder of Sinai and the Sermon on the Mount, you perceive that Christianity comes bringing happiness and asking you to carry happiness to all within your part of society. Christ in his own true isolation was not an ascetic, but an advocate of human cheerfulness. There were no tears of sympathy falling down through the Mosaic times, such as rained down through the Bethlehem skies when Christ went from home to home and from village to village, cheering all, and healing all, and blessing all. The time for burning the skeptical and stoning to death the idolator rolled away like a black cloud after the Advent, and the new dispensation was seen blessing all, comforting the mourner, holding in its arms little children. The austerity of the Mosaic era Christ would not permit to envelope even the Sabbath, much less all the days of the week, for passing through the wheat-fields on Sunday, he commanded his companions to eat cheerfully of the sweet wheat, since the Sabbath was made for man, and not man for a Sabbath. At the wedding feast Christ harmonized with the festival and helped fill the wine-cup of the happy hours. Those lilies which Christ saw were not seen by the bloody men that put to death so willingly the Amorite and the Perrizite, but they were trampled down by the rush of the horsemen and the iron chariots. In Christ you will perceive just that sensibility of soul which loves at once the happiness of self and the joy of all mankind.

---

---

This must be said over all history, not only of Mosaic times but of Gospel times, and all early periods: that it omits to picture to us the laugh and smile and delight of man, and exhausts its time upon those wars and events and characters which overthrew thrones or set up thrones or changed the maps of nations. History is a filing in and out of soldiery. It is a march of kings and queens. In all its long period no happy children are seen; no feast is spread, unless like Belshazzer's it is to be followed by some calamity, and some poet is about to say:

---

“ Hour of the empire's overthrow—
The princes to the feast are gone; ”

no marriage bell rings; no mirth-making stories are told; no young people dance in the large halls. As kings were the large things of the by-gone centuries, around them moved all the chronicles of events from Ezra to Gibbon, each writer composing his book as on a shield, and dipping his pen in an inkstand made of a skull or of a helmet. Looking into such a record our fathers shaped our religion to fit this funereal gloom, and gave us a worship in whose sombre presence pleasure partook of the quality of a sin or of a weakness. This being true, it is the privilege and duty of our time to note the injustice of history and to affirm that Christianity is in full sympathy with that vast love of pleasure that fills up the mortal soul. Gloomy religionists inquire whether Christ ever laughed, and whether St. Paul ever joined in a dance!—as though there were a most withering rebuke to the inquiry. This we know: that history has never given us the picture of man in his home and joys and laughter and all delights, but only of man as swaying a scepter or as making a speech or writing a poem or founding a religion; and hence you who love pleasure need not ask Josephus or Tacitus or Livy or Hume or Gibbon to show you a precedent; you may cast your case upon the wisdom of a different Court—that of reason—or you may re-write history and omit the battle-field and the monarch, and fill your pages with common men, women and children, from all lands and all generations. Thus studying man you will find that the pursuit of happiness has quickened his genius and the beating of his heart all along his great highway, from the old Eden to the fresh and new America.

---

Happiness thus revealing itself as a lawful and noble and universal pursuit, it must now be asked what happiness is it that is so lawful and noble? It must be a happiness that does not conflict with morality. Pleasure sought by a violation of any law of health or of conscience or of society, is only a pain delayed. The so-called “daughters of joy” are the daughters of infinite grief. And the appeal to the drunkard’s glass for happiness is only placing a heavy mortgage upon the soul in good times to be paid with heavy interest when times are bad. The pleasure of the gambler, the betting man, and generally the fashionable man, is only an inflation of to-day at the expense of to-morrow. Happiness is much like money—money must represent an actuality. It must stand for some stored-up labor of individual or nation. If a man has earned a farm or a house or has digged a pot of gold; he may issue bills of paper almost to the amount of value in his farm or house or pot of gold, but should he issue checks or drafts to ten times the value of his reality, his bills must decline to ten cents on the dollar so as to harmonize with his possessions. No man and no State, however powerful, can create a value. No State can make land or make a wheat-crop. Their bills of exchange must represent what is. God alone can create. He might appeal to what might be. It is much thus with pleasure. Man cannot wander much beyond his absolute possession of power and right. An over-drinking, an over-eating, an over-tax of mind or body is an over-issue of drafts; and lo, on the morrow, an awful depreciation of body and mind and soul is reported on street and change and in the church circles, and in that most tender and tearful place—the home. You see on the streets daily persons, male and female, who years ago discounted too heavily their future, and now the time is out. The health of the body and of the mind, the welfare of self and of society, the eternal laws of God—these are realities upon which all may issue their pleasure-notes, but the instant you go beyond these actualities you become a defaulter—you are no longer in the vale of pleasure, but of pain.

---

It must therefore be true that what we call amusements are things to be regulated rather than sweepingly condemned. The pleasure of the theatre, of games, of the hunt, of the dance, of the dinner, of the party, of the club, must be one that shall not overtax health or morals or money, or militate against one's avocation. The bounding line between virtue and vice is not always made vividly on life's great plain. Our world was not made for the accommodation of stupid people nor for the growth and increase of stupidity, but to develop the intellect and the judgment. All college students are wont to ask, "Why study this Greek, with its endless details and rules and exceptions? Why not study easier things?" And the grave teachers will say in triumph, there is a vast amount of discipline in Greek. After mastering that all else will be easy. These Greek professors have nature on their side; for nature draws dim lines between virtue and vice, pleasure and pain, and then says: "Find these lines, oh, my children, and you will become as mighty men!" The old church declined the task. It asked for easy studies. It condemned the whole region of faint boundaries. It condemned the drama and the dance and the games, and even laughter and a neat toilet, and fell back on its formulas as being about the only place where reason's trumpet could utter no uncertain sound. A religious Conference being unable to distinguish between croquet and billiards, did not admit billiards but they abolished croquet.

---

And now let us come to one more general law about the pursuit of happiness. You perceive tens of thousands setting out from home at times in the pursuit of this winged butterfly. They go to what are called "resorts." They ride and they sail; they eat and they drink, and they make merry. Often this is all well enough, and much of what they seek is found. But it would be a strange law of Nature if man must travel from home in order to find any important form of blessedness. Such a law would give pleasure to only those having some money, and would give it to them only in July and August. Nature does not fill the soul with an immense and universal longing and then bring to this longing such a small outcome. It has made no such failure as this, but on the opposite God has made happiness grow up around the very avocations which consume all our days, and around the cities or towns or homes which cherish us when the toil of the day is done. Each profession, each business should be also a pursuit of happiness. Men should so regulate their work, if possible, in its quantity and quality, that they will go to it each morning with pleasure. In all the ten thousand honorable pursuits the toiler in each industry goes cheerfully to his task, for his feelings have fitted themselves to it like a soft glove to the hand. There are men now in the learned professions who came up from a farm; and now in looking back over the long stretch of years they cannot tell when they were happiest—whether it was last year in a public life or in their years of student life, or in those former years when they were up at dawn in summer to get ready for plowing or harvesting while the grass was still glittering with dew. One may find pleasure by travel and by any form of diversion, but God has so made the world that the great bulk of its joyfulness is to spring up around home and its pursuits. The heart is born into it.

And all ye young hearts who are just entering upon this great debate about pleasure, where it is to be found, do not fall into the error that when you become rich then you will try to be happy. Happiness is the most accommodating of all things. It will come to a cottage as soon as to a palace. You need never wait for any outward pomp to come. As the sunshine of the Almighty will shine through a simple vine as richly as upon the velvet of a king or upon the gilded dome of a temple, so happiness falls with equal sweetness upon all whose minds are at peace and in whose hearts flow the good thoughts and good sentiments of life. Never for a moment admit that any millionaire or king can surpass you in the possession of that peace of mind and smile of existence which we call happiness. Here you are equal to the highest.

Upon duties well done to self and mankind, upon health of soul and body, this dependent vine bears its weight. Pleasure is not a self-sustaining oak, but it is a dependent vine. The great vine of Santa Barbara, which bears tons of grapes each year, and which demands almost a field for its arbor, and which has a trunk sixteen inches in diameter, does not stand alone, but wanders to and fro over strong posts, clasping them all in its many arms. Happiness is thus only a dependent, climbing product of the soul's floral world. The many pursuits of man, his industry, his studies, his honor, his home, his philosophy, his shape of religion, are a long series of columns upon which this flowering plant hangs and relies, and from which it shows its blossoms and suspends its fruit. God has made man not only for toil but for this joyfulness. Let no yearnings for riches or for office or for any form of vain display, destroy or impede the stream of contentment and peace which the Creator designed should all the year flow through your soul. The fact that religion paints Heaven as being a happy land, is enough to point out the lawfulness and attractiveness of happiness; for what is so desirable on the shores of eternity must be a boon to seek and to find on the shores of time.

---

BENEVOLENCE.

V.

BENEVOLENCE.

ONE of the most wonderful attributes of humanity is that quality in the civilized man that makes him desire the happiness of others. We call man a selfish creature. The most common form of fault-finding consists in accusing the human family of acting in the name of only self-interest. No doubt we all come far short of any ideal disinterestedness, but after all man is the only creature on earth in which may be found traces of any desire to secure the happiness of others. In those noblest of animals—the elephant, the horse, the dog—there is no mitigation of the doctrine of self-esteem. These creatures will always attempt to take possession of the entire quantity of food to eat or water to drink that may be placed before them. Instinct has always seen to it that the brute world shall love their young and care for them tenderly. The common song-bird will begin to gather food for its brood by half-past three in summer mornings, and the curious have kept count and have found that the thrush will take something to her young ones five or six hundred times during the day. The moment, however, the young of all birds and animals have reached maturity, all this kindness suddenly ceases, and the bird which so tenderly cared for her brood last July, would now in December, if possible, steal from them the last grain of millet or wild rice, or the last drop of water.

Even were it possible for the advocates of the development theory to show us how the form of the mollusk might be developed into the form of an ape, and afterward into a human outline, they would find an insurmountable barrier to pass when they should attempt to explain to us how the perfect selfishness of brute life ever became transformed into the charity of manhood. There may be a resemblance between the ear and eye of an animal and the ear and eye of a man, but all resemblance passes away the moment you look into the mental structure of animal and man. And to-day we have come upon one of those attributes which declare man to be of divine quality. Benevolence signifies the love of others, and perhaps more than any other human attribute betrays the excellence of man at large, or of an age, or of an individual.

---

Much of the complaint over the selfishness of the age, or this or that person, comes from the fact that there is in each mind always an ideal by which each one is constantly measuring the men and times around. It is essential to possess this ideal, for it is the pattern up toward which all are to work. It is the standard of weight and measure which is to rule the human race in all its long career ; a strange standard, which makes itself to be higher and higher as men approach. Essential as this standard is, it has its inconvenience, for it makes painfully evident all the world's shortcomings. With this ideal in our bosoms, we all go about measuring the selfishness of others, and find that there is not very much self-denial for the advantage of the race. To estimate the world fairly we must now and then fling away this crucial test—the ideal—and must see things in the common light of to-day or in the bad light of antiquity. Should a man come up to you with a most powerful magnifying glass and make a survey and declare that your skin were rough as the shell of an oyster, and that your hands were as large as spades, and that your eye were like that of a Cyclops, you would be justified in telling him that you were not made to be viewed through a microscope, but to be seen at a respectful distance in nature's common light. When a fastidious gentleman once declared that not more than one lady in a hundred was good-looking, he was most perfectly answered by the remark that not more than one man in five hundred possessed good sense ;—properly answered, because he had no natural right to subject to the fastidious ideal microscope the features of woman. There is a common light, not very strong, in which we must all walk—woman with her imperfect beauty and man with his inadequate common sense. We must love ideals and struggle toward them ourselves, but we must not use them excessively in the measurement of others.

---

Viewing the human race in this moderate manner, we see benevolence painting its rich colors upon its length and breadth. Enough of this quality exists to show us what a divine virtue it is and will remain. When the philosophers began to seek a definition of the word “civilization,” they looked into the possession of wealth and found that civilization did not lie in that form of acquisition, for lo! the Turks and the Spaniards of Mexico had great riches. They looked again and surveyed the fine arts, and there again they failed to find the home of the favorite idea, for Thebes and Babylon and Ninevah enjoyed the beautiful, but these people were semi-barbarous; the philosophers looked again and inquired whether this finish of manhood lay not in intellectual development, but that the Greeks and Romans possessed, and yet they were partly savage, for they held slaves and put to death captives or infants. Driven from one position to another, our wise men have at last reached the conclusion that the highest culture is that which most wisely and tenderly seeks the happiness of all mankind. That is to say, that the man who combines the most wisdom and the most benevolence is the most divine man. The wisdom delivers from all the enemies of self, and the benevolence makes that same wisdom the good fortune of others. Lord Bacon possessed vast learning and worldly wisdom, but was wanting in his relations toward mankind—and such was his age; and hence, it can never compare with that subsequent England which has more and more shaped the legislation for the benefit of the multitude. The true greatness of nation or individual begins when self, be it a Throne or a Man, begins to confess the presence and need of those outside of self.

---

It will probably be found true that the very poetry and literature of our later generations have become more imbued with benevolence than all past literature was colored with such a sentiment. The fading away of the epic poem which celebrated the military and romantic exploits of some hero, was probably caused by the fact that better sentiments than those of the warrior came along quietly but surely to displace his figure in verse. Burns, Wordsworth, Thompson, Cowper, and all recent writers of sentiment, have had more to say about the rights and happiness of man than about the glory of war. When Cowper sang his familiar lines over the emancipation of England's slaves, he was setting to music the new benevolence of society. Burns was in the same atmosphere when he wrote most of his songs. So was Hood when he sang about the "One More Unfortunate" or the sorrows of the poor sewing women; and in this path of sympathy with the world, most of the high novelists have walked in a noble group together. If you will look into literature you will perceive that a great change has come over it since it was shaped by either Homer or Dante or Milton. No one of these mighty masters gave to human feeling such a benevolent coloring as has been given it by all the recent years. All old poems abound in sublimity and fancy, but all modern poetry abounds in pathos. I speak of poetry because it has always been such a mirror of its age. As by looking upon the wall where a camera obscura is placed you can in your little room or tent mark who and what are passing along all the streets outside, so by looking into the verses of an epoch you may mark whether outside were battlefields and heroes, as around Homer; or whether the church was immense, as around Dante and Milton; or whether the throne and palace were large, as around Shakspeare. For this reason I call up poetry as a mirror, and looking into that of to-day I perceive that sympathy for mankind is playing a large part in the pageant of our country. Selfishness indeed remains in the human heart, but love is beginning to flow over the banks of self and to give its Nile-like blessings to all the valley on either shore.

---

This week upon which we now enter is almost wholly given up to the worship of benevolence. If benevolence is the love of others, Christmas is the day set apart for the worship of others. It is called a day, but that day consumes the half-score of days that lie before it. As Eastern Kings were wont to come to a town heralded by advance messengers, and as the messengers grew more and more rich in livery the nearer they were to the King, so this royal Christmas sends many days on in advance of himself; and thus, being indeed only one personage, he lengthens himself out into a procession and impresses hundreds of hours into his happy service. All the last few days have worn the bright livery of heralds of a King. This day, so loved, draws almost all its moral charm from the fact that no one thinks of self, but by the law of the occasion dreams only of the happiness of others. What to buy for another, what to make with one's own hand for another—this is the whole significance of December. In the many religions of the past almost all the days of the year were sacred to some saint or god, but it is not evident that any one of these days was dedicated to that strange shape of religion—the love of man for others. But at last man has added to the altars where he was wont to think of war or money or pleasure—an altar on which he places offerings to others.

---

Year by year the love which shall come to this altar will enlarge its horizon. At first it will see only the relatives and friends of itself. And that is indeed a beautiful sight; but after a few years or generations of this form of service, the heart in richness will see other children and persons that do not belong to its own fireside, and the service which began in a tent will swell outward until the world shall have become its cathedral, full of rapturous hymns and carols.

There is a mysterious quality in this relation of each man to all men. Almost all learning and discovery partakes somewhat of the nature of benevolence. In these latter days the inventor hastens indeed to protect himself with patents from Government, but this is not simply that he may reap all the money-reward, but also that no other may steal from him the honor of having helped the people. No thinker, from Galileo to our Fulton and Morse, has discovered some new law or application of Nature's forces without being moved partly by the happiness the people would gain from the steamboat or the telegraph. Before such minds as Newton and Galileo no motive of pecuniary gain arose, and perhaps none before Watt or Fulton. They seem to have desired that the world should have the happiness of enjoying new truths and new powers. It must have been a moment of supreme joy when Morse found the daily papers for the first time publishing in the morning what had been said or done at cities so remote that no flying train or flying dove could have brought the messages. The reward of money must have been insignificant compared with that happiness which came from seeing the people of the great world happy over this winged speech.

---

It shows that benevolence is the impulse of much of the world's science and learning—the fact that a long line of scholars and inventors march along before us in poverty. They spent their years in hovels or garrets, and at last we see them in the gray hair of age filing along, not with crowns on their foreheads and with robes trailing gracefully, but in the plainest attire and perhaps marching in rags to that solemn retreat—the grave. But this large and talented host have not been without their reward, for as a mother finds her joy in the esteem shown her by her children, so literature and invention have drawn their rewards from the joy they have foreseen in the eyes of the human race. Benevolence—the love of man—joins with the love of personal fame, and calls into being alike the astronomy of a Galileo and the telegraph of a Morse. I remember once that a country school-master set me this copy: “If you and Tullia are well, then I also am well.” It seemed the embodiment of nonsense. It seemed that the teacher was thinking about how to teach writing, and not how to make sense. It must have been ten years afterward that the deep meaning came that no heart can be well when its dear ones are sick, and that if the absent dear ones are all well, then are all three well indeed. Benevolence makes one well in the welfare of others. Thus it appears that this copy which seemed so empty of logic, had come down a journey of 2,000 years, borne along, not by literalism, but by the wings of benevolence.

The question must often arise, how can those monarchies of Europe possess such power over the common people that they love them and will die for them? We perceive the fearful taxation and wars and confiscations of a long past, and yet we mark that the common people love all these old monarchies with a deep attachment. This state of things may be explained partly by the fact that man loves his native land, however hard his lot in its confines ; but the explanation comes partly from the additional fact that all monarchy has been softened by the greatness of its arts and parks and gardens, and by its full and free amusements. Much of the gold in the coffers of kings and queens and emperors has taken the form of architecture which the poor could love, of golden altars where the poor could kneel, of immense parks where the poor could wander with their neatly dressed children, of immense galleries where the people could see more beauty than even a king could own. Thus has benevolence come to counteract barbarism and despotism, just as May and June come at last to dissolve the icy chains of winter. Were it not that the European nations are thus softened by some forms of tenderness towards the people, everywhere would come insurrection and anarchy. Republics must do as much for the poor by private generosity as kings have done for them by power and pride.

---

You may turn aside from these large spectacles of literature and invention and government as affected by the regard for others, and pass to the smaller streets of life, and behold this sentiment runs before us. There is not a ragged school or a mission school or free school of design, or a public library in any town or city that does not spring up out of this principle. Upon the basis of religion all temples stand, and from this sentiment of a God all worship arises. From the sentiment of the beautiful in the soul spring five great fine arts; from the perception of justice comes law; and then from a soil as rich—called benevolence—rise up a hundred blessed shapes of human welfare. In the mission schools of the church toil men and women who are to gather no money and no fame, but who discharge the difficult offices each Sunday from one motive alone—the love of something besides self. You may analyze their hearts to the bottom and you will find only one motive—the happiness of others. Man in his best estate looks abroad and sees his fellow man. In that hour he ceases to be a brute to become a soul.

---

What ailed and what ails some forms of Christianity may be found in the general absence of the love of other people. The Protestant did not throw his affection far enough. As soon as he came to a Romanist his heart congealed and he longed to capture and imprison or burn the disciple of the Pope. And the Catholic more than equaled this limitation of sympathy. His love of man meant only

Catholic men. Having found a human being called a Protestant, his heart became obdurate and the torture of the other sects became the chief joy of his own. The articles of faith drawn up in those periods were therefore characterized by the same absence of a broad good will, and the same presence of an ordeal of tests that took love away from the joy of enveloping many and made it expect the happiness of the few. Religion essayed to take God away from the wide world and give Him to a group. It tried to inclose Jehovah within the clasps of a Prayer Book. It made hell too large and heaven too small. It sat down like Canute by the sea-waves and bade them arrange their great flow to suit its chair on the beach. But, as the story runs, the waves came marching on. Each minute on the dial the great tides reaching a thousand miles outward and a thousand miles right and left, arose and laughed as it swelled upward and onward. They heard no human voice—cared for none. So the actual Christianity has too long attempted to limit the Deity and the Lord and confine them by lines of thought and ceremony drawn upon the great shore. But the tide of Divine Love has for a long time swept steadily inward, and each hour the rushing waters shall rise and laugh until at last the kings of old forms of thought will be compelled to move back and confess that the benevolence of religion is an ocean whose wave they cannot impede. Benevolence is crowding back the arrogance of old masters.

---

Thus among the powers that have moved and that shall move the human soul, let us place this love of others outside of self. Geologists find that when earth first cooled after its primal fire it was a mass of volcanic rock. Our world was barren and bald as the peaks of Sinai; but out of the mysterious stores of nature there were to come rains and frosts and winds and decay, and those forces were to assail the adamant and gradually extract from it a soil which should grow the maize, the orange and the rose. In long ages after these Titans had been at work the Garden of Eden was ready for man. In the spiritual world the human heart lay once like the primeval rocks; but Titantic motives have beaten on that adamant and lo! at the end of each epoch of a thousand or ten thousand years the soil of the human garden has been found deeper and richer, and over it have bent heavier grain and richer flowers. Among these smiters of the rock, whose wand has brought forth sweeter waters than those which flowed when Moses smote the mountain in Horeb, place that love for others as mighty among the mighty. If you would measure its beauty, mark what mortals and immortals were those who have won their name, not by riches, not by genius, not by invention, not by the sword, but by the inspiration of benevolence. From the happiness of others many of the deepest thinkers drew their impulse and reward; hence came the heroism of the martyrs of a better religion and a better liberty;—these all wished to plant trees from whose branches other generations should gather the sweeter fruit; into this domain of motive, as if to point out forever its dignity and worth, descended Jesus Christ, leaving a Heaven of Joy for a world of labor, because the toil should be for others, not for self; into this motive He came ready for crown of thorns and for death, if only out of his personal griefs there might come nations and homes, and even tombs full of happiness and hope.

.

---

RELIGION.

VI.

RELIGION.

It is impossible to affix to any one of the considerations which influence the conduct of man the title of greatest. The material world will submit to a measurement. Man may determine what mountain is highest, what river longest, what sea deepest, but in the spiritual world he must throw aside his exact measurements and be content with the feeling that all is great and mysterious. The dust of the universe is measurable, but not so its spiritual things. It is as though the world, intellectual and moral, were preparing us to accept of the infinity of a God. Were there any method by which we might compare together the leading ideas which have led the human family along its great journey, it would seem that the motive of religion has been most powerful. But there is no standard or method of comparison here, and therefore we must content ourselves by declaring great among the powers that have moved man, is the affirmation of religion.

At some time in history that gifted being, man, must have begun to feel that it was some more powerful being than he or than all his race that had placed the sun and stars in the sky and had made such a structure as the earth. The Bible mentions a far-off time when men began to call upon the name of the Lord, and outside this old record, all through Egyptian antiquity, the mind is seen deducing from the encompassment of man, the fact and presence of a Deity. Job, one of the ancient books, presents in the most eloquent and logical and poetic of manners the argument that early drove society toward faith in the Creator. When this Chaldean Job asks: "Doth the hawk fly by thy wisdom and stretch her wings toward the south? Doth the eagle mount up at thy command and make her nest on high? Who causeth it to rain on earth where no man is?—on the wilderness wherein is no man?” He shows the human reason in the act of drawing near to God. The hundred or more of these sharp questions in that old treasure of literature reveal a natural theology not surpassed by that of Xenophon or Lactantius or Paley. In the four periods represented by these four personages, Job, Xenophon, Lactantius and Paley—the Chaldean, Greek, Roman and English periods—we perceive the best forms of reason following one line of thought toward the one conclusion—the logical necessity of a Creator. Whether therefore man came to his reasoning powers at once by an instantaneous gift of his Creator, or came thither by a long development from a kind of infancy of thought, he came to a full conviction at last that there was a Being outside of the human race who was King of Kings and Lord of Lords. It is unknown at what time in earth's history or in man's history this religious sentiment sprang into life, but however far back our students of the past go with their excavations and their deciphering, they cast up out of buried ruins or read from engraved stones or tiles, at once the treasures of art and of religion. Thus we infer that the same intellectual power which gave birth to a fine art gave birth also to a religion—that the power of logic which led to an architecture or an implement or a science, led also to a Deity, for out of the same heap of ruins come always emblems not only of the beautiful but of the religious.

---

In the excavations of Babylonia George Smith reads from the buried tiles this psalm: "Oh my Lord, my transgression is great, my sins many. The transgression I committed I know not. I know not the sin I committed" —a psalm which shows us how the assumed holiness of a God drew tears of penitence from man thousands of years before David wrote his penitential psalm, or before the Church gathered these spiritual regrets into a miserere. But we need not delay over the question of the antiquity of the religious sentiment. It appears as soon as the human mind appears. Wherever our scholars go to exhume some buried city, when they dig up a piece of writing or a fragment of the beautiful, there they dig up an image of a God and a verse of a psalm, as though to show us that where there has come the intelligence that can write a poem or frame a law, there has come the logical power to infer that man had a Creator.

---

When one of our public men—public speakers I mean—was found recently at an auction of antiques, bidding on all the images of childish religions, as though he were going to kill Christianity by the ridicule of a new and laughable pantheon, he was only purchasing abundant evidence that the human soul has always been full of a tender religious sentiment, that looked up for an explanation of these years so full of joy and death. As it would not bring music into ridicule should the same satirist purchase at auction all the ram's horns that once were blown around Jerico, or all the shrill pipes of Pan, or the three stringed harps of Greek idlers, or the tum tum drums of the Indians, so should he accumulate a large assortment of fetishes and divinities, he will have made no approach toward any ridicule of the religious feeling in society. As all the noble sentiments break away from a childish past and rise into greatness, so religion will not be embarrassed by any smallness of its childhood, but it will gaze steadily upon a dignified present and an unveiling future.

Having seen the simple fact that there is in the bosom of man a religious motive, let us pass now to consider some of the elements of its power.

---

A first element of the power of this motive may be found in that quality of mind which feels conscious of the rightness and wrongness of actions. Whether the idea was innate or has been acquired need not be debated here, but by some means man has reached a full conviction that there are things which he should not do, and things which he should do, and which are most noble things to do—to be done—and out of this inmost consciousness there comes a feeling that there is some Creator of the universe who is looking after this badness and goodness of mankind, to punish the one and reward the other. Thus this universal and powerful feeling of rightness and wrongness has been all through history, stimulating the motive called religion. In that legend or fact where Adam or Cain attempts to hide from the results of a sin, we see in emblem the whole human race attempting to conceal its bad acts from the eye of infinite justice. There being in man a sense of sin and of virtue, what is next demanded is some tribunal before which the actors must be arraigned. In our earthly government a law of right and wrong on the statute book is of no value unless there be some tribunal before which the case may be brought. It therefore comes to pass that some criminals fly to foreign states, that they may find, not a place where vice becomes a virtue, but a place where there is no court having power to arraign and condemn. There being in man a sense of right and wrong, religion becomes a most potent influence, because it announces a judgment bar before which all must stand. It completes the theory of virtue and vice by reminding the soul that it is daily approaching a final rendering of its accounts. If the world had only laws and a Law-giver, it would be as imperfect as would be a State, which should have only a statute book, and no courts, no executive. Religion transforms the great Lawgiver into a great judge, and lays thus the deep foundation of justice.

---

Like all other forms of truth, this reverence for the Infinite Judge passed through its period of darkness and error. Men attempted to secure blessings and pardon, and even to secure vengeance upon enemies by offering gifts to the Judge, or by binding themselves with vows that should cover the future, but gradually the intelligence of man has found regular, uniform laws of God, in obedience to which is happiness, in transgression of which is sorrow; but both these periods show us the human race alike as living in presence of a Judge who will here and hereafter, or here alone, or hereafter alone, make just return to the evil and the good. The religious motive is thus clothed with the powers of a final justice.

In the workings of this great motive the fear of punishment has perhaps been more influential than the simple hope of happiness, but the part which the hope of acceptance with God and of a blessed union with him here and hereafter has performed is, could we see it all, very impressive. Man not only dreads pain, but he loves happiness; and therefore it has come to pass that countless millions in all times have attempted to live near to God, because of the present and future blessedness of such a companionship. Regardless of any hell, they have loved the quality and the rewards of virtue. Not only the highest forms of Christian character, but also some of the highest pagans have sought uprightness because of its moral beauty—a beauty of morals, of mind, of self-consciousness and peace. Borne along by their religion into this great discrimination and culture of the right, it has become to some a form of the beautiful.

---

Mr. Field, the editor, who has traveled almost all over our earth—and with his sense wide open and with not a narrow sense at that—said recently that he had found in pagan lands where our Christianity was unknown, some most charming souls who loved virtue and piety as much as child ever loved a flower. Having letters of introduction to a local prince, the prince sent word to Mr. Field that on the morrow he would be at his service, but that day just passing, he was keeping in communion with his God. With the sun of the next morning the venerable pagan came along with richly caparisoned elephants for his Christian guests. But the beauty of the story is yet to come, for Mr. Field soon found himself in the palace of a man against whom no poor man or poor woman could bring any charge of any form of dishonor out of his long past. The neighborhood looking to him for a half century could see only the beauty of goodness.

It must have been out of this study of God as the emblem of virtue and of its happiness, that those pagan wise men of India framed their rebuke to the British sporting officers, expressed in these lines: "You Christians must have a strange religion; for in our divine philosophy the death of a bird may be a necessity, but it can never be a pleasure." If now within the twilight of a pagan faith, the soul can extract such high views and such a spiritual joy from contemplating the piety and tenderness of the Deity, what may not this religious motive become when guided and inflamed by the holier light issuing from the pages of our divine books? In our era the standard of goodness found in the New Testament, unveiling as it does the true God, marks the uprising of a new power to sway the soul, a power which like a sea can carry upon its wide bosom a vast army of soldiers of a higher life—not armadas of cruel troops, but of kind and enlightened men.

---

Next to this element of right and wrong, as developed by the standard of a God, must be reckoned the influence of all that mystery which is grouped under the general name of religion. All have been deeply affected by these questions of final destiny, and as they are made the special study of religion, they must be considered as a part of its powerful motive. Science declines the inquiry about heaven and hell and immortal life. It confesses, perhaps humbly, perhaps sarcastically, that its study terminates with the dissolution of the body—that it has no crucible, nor balances, nor spectrum with which to examine a soul. Politics says nothing about any empire beyond the tomb. Even the divinely called Moses himself when he was writing down the laws of his society on a mountain, smoking and hot with justice, made no allusion to any land beyond Canaan, any life beyond this, and this severity of the State returns in our day to exclude from legislation the name of a God. More and more mankind commits to religion all this great argument and great conjecture over things beyond the coffin of our dust. Thus religion stands alone as a vase full of mysteries—those black and white flowers of the sepulchre.

Of all the solemnities of which the mind can conceive, death is the greatest. Even when not the King of terrors it is at least the King of mysteries. Should we know that a man were to be put to death in our city at a certain hour to-morrow, almost all hearts would beat strangely out of measure in that moment. Business would pause in all the streets in the one minute of such a public and fixed death. As when a piano string is struck, all metals in the room that are in harmony vibrate in companionship, so were a murderer doomed to die in a public square at a fixed moment, a half million hearts would beat in the agony, not from any unison of crime, but from a fellowship in death's awful mystery. Men walk softly when they walk among graves. Those of you who, in former years have walked through a country churchyard, where the house of prayer always stands amid the white stones of loving memory, can remember still with what guarded foot and guarded voice you went from willow to willow, or from slab to slab in the June grass. You needed no book of etiquette to remind you that you had found a place where the foot must not be in haste, nor be rude, and where there should be a more quiet tone of voice, and where speech should wish to give place to meditation. It is not to be wondered at that the sweetest of poems came to Gray when he was thus moved or rested among the Churchyard yewtrees. Now this sentiment which so possesses the heart in these peculiar moments spreads all over life, and there are perhaps few days when the music of being is not strangely intermingled with that more solemn strain rising up from the vale of death. There may be here and there an empty heart and a thoughtless brain across which no churchyard meditation passes for months or years together; but these are exceptional and leave unaffected the truth that no one reflection comes to man with such uniformity and power as the thought that in a few years we shall all be far away. This is the thought that fills the churches on the holy days, and which makes those who differ in creed and those who hold no creed join willingly in one hymn, because all hearts are one in this religious mystery. A common grave creates a common religion.

---

Our deepest thinkers have shown us how climate and the formation of the ground affect

---

character. They find a certain culture coming out of Scotland's hills, and France's sunshine, and out of Egypt's mild sky and dreamy air; they tell us that that dry climate of the desert invited Egypt to dream of no decay of art or soul; they tell us that the Southern zones repress thought, and that the North redoubles it, that earthquakes develop cowards, that war makes heroes; that the intellect was made dull in the "thick air of Bœotia," and they find the varying influence of food and pursuits and institutions; they show us that home and democracy came issuing from the Feudal house where a lord began to detract from a king, and where the fireside became a school, a cottage and a church; but after we had gathered up and have measured all these hands that have shaped the soul's clay, we shall find them all surpassed by tracings made upon our urns of life by the heavy and strange hand of death. It has toiled in all times and climates. Alike in South and North, among Scotland's mountains or in Egyptian plains, this form of thought has played by day and night. It intruded itself upon a Saint Paul or a Cæsar; it came to terrify a Herod, to inspire a St. John. No spring or autumn can equal eternity in touching the heart.

---

Carrying in our bosoms such a motive as religion, it remains to inquire what kind of a religion should we ask to come in and move us onward in this life-march. Will any shape of it answer as well as any other? There being many forms of this sentiment and philosophy, it would be an amazing state of affairs should they all be of equal value. Compare together the belief of the Red-man and the belief of the Quaker and what a difference of intrinsic worth! The former is a cruel and childish superstition in part, the latter is a strange combination of piety and the highest utility. Thus the world's religions rise up before us in an infinite variety of shapes, as varying as the wild animals that come in from the forest or the jungle or the desert. Having assumed that the soul must live and die in a religion, it becomes a most important inquiry what shall be the form of my so-called piety? What quality must this motive assume? On what kind of a branch must this chameleon lie? The world mentions "that this and that number got religion last winter," but tells us not what shape of it they thus secured. When the old Catholics "got religion" they hastened out and put to death a multitude of fellow-men; and when our Protestant ancestors "got religion" they too went forth to exterminate all who tasted their Saviour in a wafer or who said their prayers before the beaming eyes of the Virgin. Looking into this past, it becomes evident that at the very moment of getting religion the mind should know what religion it has received or is about to accept.

---

This rule will be a good one, that the broader and truer and grander the motive which fills and sways the soul the greater at last will be the soul! For the soul, like Moore's vase, is perfumed by the roses it carries. We are educated by these motives that lie in the heart. All these motives mentioned — knowledge, home, honor, benevolence and happiness—are educators of the inmost man. And as home is better to the degree of its peace and comfort and knowledge, to the degree of its quality, so religion must be a choice and select religion, that it may bear the soul aloft on its blessed wings.

The seeker of this piety may join himself to almost any one of the modern sects. While all may believe that all Jews who are faithful to their Deism are children of the Christian's God, and that devout, faithful pagans will join with the saints of all ages in a great harmony beyond this world, yet we find in the Christian Church the ideal service of our heavenly Father. It is the one among ten thousand, and in its leading head, Christ, it is spotless. The Church breaking up into many streams, like the river which flowed through Eden, offers sweet waters in any part of its divided wave. The seeker of this religion may enter any sanctuary, provided he can do so with the open-hearted confessions that the other gates will open for others to the same blessings here and hereafter. One may join a sect if he will not make that little confine the motive of his days and years. One may make of a sect a convenience, an aid, a staff of his long march, but all the while he must love more that vast Church of the Almighty of which temple the sects are separate stones, and toward whose portals the little creed is a staff to make firm the slow and uncertain footsteps.

---

We may love our garden and home tenderly, but we must not trample down the field of another; but each morning when the dew hangs upon our vines we must confess that it glistens as well in the parks of our neighbors, and sparkled before we were born, and will be full of sunbeams after we are dead.

All denominations invite, and all are good, but you must never attempt to see the ocean in a cup, when its great self lies only a few steps away moving in all its magnificence. Fling aside the cup, for a few paces will bring you to that Christ where charity and righteousness expand like the fields of the heavens.

The religion which should in these days come to move men should, besides being one of boundless good will, be one of inflexible integrity. The world is not vexed by voluminous creeds, except only so far as they have diverted the church from the study of character and action. The world has often found men dishonest, and little and cruel, who yet could recite a hundred articles that make up a salvation. The impression has gained ground that in some way this intellectual work has turned the church aside from a broad humanity and from a study of the actions of Christ. All things, the pressure of reason, the disappointment of society over the results of a complex faith, the demand for noble men and women, the natural tendency of intellect toward simplicity, require that he who "gets religion" in these years, should secure one that shall stand close by the simplicity and broadness and rightness of the central Christ.

---

Such a religion in the end will be a motive of life and action which nothing can surpass. Instead of contracting the mind, as Christianity in the past has done again and again, it will enlarge the heart into its own large proportions. Before its benignant eyes the world will lie to be taught, to be aided, to be forgiven, but not to be hated. And the broader a faith is the more imperishable. It is the local that dies. This made Moses perish and his ceremony. Popes and kings and thinkers and soldiers, have been destroyed because they loved the ideas of a day, but Christ is as powerful in the nineteenth century as he was in the first, because His principles were as broad as all centuries. The human family cannot outlive them nor migrate beyond them. May the religious ideas and impulses which shall influence you all, be those which shall possess an infinite charity and an imperishable truth.

BEAUTY.

VII.

BEAUTY.

ONE of the most marvelous qualities in man must be confessed to be the obligation that compels him to make out of the world's beauty a motive of life. He is commanded by his nature to place a high value upon what is, when analyzed, only an ornamentation. Philosophy attends man when he seeks food, drink, clothing, shelter, education, institutions and laws; but when the same man turns aside from these essential paths and plucks a flower or puts a red feather in his hat or makes a robe of many colors philosophy steps back amazed and asks why he should be guilty of such conduct. Jacob made for his favorite son a coat of many colors. Philosophy can see a reason for the coat, but it finds no explanation of the colors. It fails, also, to perceive why the brethren of Joseph should have been offended at the gorgeousness of the raiment, because all the merit of the garment lay in the fact and goodness of the coat—the colors, however many or bright, not being able to enter into the data of pure thought. The coat was a ground of envy so far as it was comfortable in cold days, but the appearance of the goods could in reason have weighed nothing for or against the emotion of envy.

It is singular that the only animal that can reason is also the only animal that greatly cares for something for which no reason can be assigned. Man is the only creature that reasons; he is also the only animal that loves beauty, but he can not assign a reason for his passion. The beaver builds a house, but he aims only at comfort. There are no marble columns and no Gothic openings in the beaver's home. The bee makes an elegant honey-comb, but the skull of a dead lion, a hollow in a tree, makes as good a hive for the nectar as the little laborer desires. It asks no help from beauty. When the sparrow builds its nest no effort is made to have the materials match in quality or cost or color. A ribbon and a cotton string keep company, and long straws and threads hang and flutter in the wind. The one idea of utility prevails and after that comes chaos. But when we come to the reasoner — man — we find him hotly pursuing all his life an end for which he can not assign a cause. No sooner has he reached the idea of house than he rears stone columns in front. Later on his children have fluted the columns. Afterward his descendants polish the shafts. Then follow decorations until the Church of St. Peter's, which cost fifty million dollars, must be composed of ten million dollars for the house-idea proper and forty million dollars for the decorations. In the modern home which costs one hundred thousand dollars perhaps one-fourth the sum is spent at the bidding of beauty alone.

---

Beauty rises up as a costly sentiment. Compared with the outlay for beauty, wars and distilled drinks come cheaply. From the baby's wagon to the old man's coffin money flows along this one channel. Many a bouquet of roses held in a girl's hand for an evening cost as much as a farm cost in these rich prairies when we were young. Costly or cheap, beauty is inexplicable. When the great Greek statesmen and scholars assembled to hear an essay, or for a wise talk, they put wreathes of leaves about their foreheads. Why did they do this? Did the wreathes add anything to the wisdom of the symposium? Reason is silent. Reason can not fathom the ocean of beauty. It walks to and fro, amazed, upon that shore.

.

---

If the rational powers can not point out a reason for this human chase, why does not man abandon the pursuit? This abandoning has been tried, and it has failed to make the gain as great as the loss. The old aphorism used to say: "It will cost something to be religious; it will cost more not to be so." The words can now be spoken over this kindred sentiment: "It will cost something to love the beautiful; it will cost more not to do so." In India, where the fakirs have made all ornament a sin, where to eat, to drink, to breathe in the cheapest manner are the aims of being, the soul finds its lowest depths. In many corners of London and Paris, and in all great cities, all beauty is absent from home, dress, conduct and language; but instead of justifying these scenes the human race demands that money be flung into those dens of ugliness until some of the world's sweetness may become visible. For reasons unknown to man beauty is an immense power. All the marble columns that have tottered and fallen, all the statues exhumed, all the jingling verses that have come down to us from the past, tell us that human power once held sway in those fields of columns and song. All past beauty is the evidence of past greatness.

The words of Solomon that God hath made everything beautiful in its time do not carry the reason with them; nor have the centuries that have passed since they were uttered made amends for the old absence of adequate cause, but humanity has not waited for a good argument; it has rushed into the fields and gathered the roses; it has stood in delight where the singing birds could be heard or the sunset colors seen. The fact that this sense is an instinct does not remove it from the presence of reason, for self-preservation is an instinct, but reason tells man why he should live and protect his life. To many an instinct logic comes and points out the reason of its being, but no logic has ever told man why he should love a marble column, and be partial to certain eight notes of sound

---

By thought and studied justice, the supreme courts may cease to be respecters of persons, and may decide for a white man or a black man with no element of prejudice, but when the millions of sounds stand before the bar of judgment eight sounds always are elected as favorites, and all the residue are ordered back and away. Thus, along with the eight notes, other points and facts come up to be elected into this eternal life. The world's millions say: "We love you, come with us," and onward goes humanity with its singular sentimental companion, but no reason is assigned.

So influential has this companion always been, so powerful to exact labor, wealth and solicitude, so powerful to mold the character of mankind, that beauty must be confessed to be one of the greatest motives of life. It must take its place along with learning, skill, wealth, duty and piety as a reason why man came to this world and should wish to remain. Is life valuable? The answer must come not only from the considerations of self-culture and personal progress, not only from the duty one owes to his home and his country, but a part of the answer should come from the beauty of the world in which this life is passing along. The earth was made to be a great retainer. It pays much and promises much to all who will espouse its cause. What detentions its beauty weaves for man! Each approaching spring-time asks the heart to stay and see the leaves unfold once more. The summer says, Wait and see all my magnificence once again. And when the autumn is drawing near the heart becomes full of anxiety to see the colored leaves or hear their rustle under foot out in the October woods. Unless the body is full of pain or the mind of misfortune, each hour of the day possesses some charm that weaves a reason why the heart should not quit the scene; and even to the dying the beauty of the world makes a final appeal, and makes a Mozart wish to hear music once more, and makes the sinking Goethe ask that the curtain be drawn aside that he may once more see the sun's great flood of light. When God placed man upon this planet, He took care that the new occupant should not hasten to get away, that each violet and lily of the field should become a detention, a retainer's fee to the heart. When reason can not persuade the mind, then beauty can.

---

---

It must be, indeed, that the reason of the human race upon the earth is to be found in certain great works of utility which man is to perform; but it is also evident that the children of God were formed for happiness, and that much of this happiness was to come from that one sentiment which can transform a sound or a scene into a delight. Whatever peace of conscience and sense of duty done the soul may possess, it still asks for more of happiness, and appeals to nature and all the fine arts to add to its blessings. Has the day's work been well done? Has the hand bestowed some charity? Has some home been made happier? Then says this heart which has acted most nobly: "I should love now to walk in the garden or the woods or hear a song." A good conscience is never happiness enough of itself; it asks help from the empire of nature and art. Instead of being in itself adequate, moral peace only clothes external beauty with more power and redoubles the wealth of a sentiment to a soul that seems least to need it. Instead of drawing happiness from a clear conscience, the man having such a sense of righteousness hastens at once to extract joy from some other source. The mind does not love to feed upon itself. This will be egotism. In its good hours of charity or patriotism or justice it turns from self and asks the fields, the hills, the sky to come to its help. It can contemplate the charms of the world, but not the merit of itself. Thus born to be a seeker of happiness, man was not to find his happiness in his virtue alone, but his virtue itself was ordained to fall back upon a beautiful world.

It must be that the qualities of the mind being the same in two persons, the one who lives the nobler life will extract the more happiness, not only from self but from the phenomena of beauty. To men guilty of cruel murder mistaken sympathy often carries flowers. Worthless offerings all those! for minds that could for months plan the murder of a brother, that could allure him to a lonely place and strike him down in an instant, and thus end a beautiful world to another soul, are not minds that possess enough of divine or human peace to make beauty possible to their hearts. To all such persons, in any place or age, earth should offer nothing but a prison or a forfeiture of life. They touch the planet only to mar it. They arrest the plan of a world in which God made each thing beautiful in its time.

It is possible, could all the facts be known, that, all other things being equal, beauty stands forth more plainly revealed to the honorable than to the wicked. The poet Burns spoke of sins that petrified the feelings. As that glass or metal must be highly polished that will give back the image of any object placed before it, so that heart must possess a calm surface which would make full answer when the rose blooms before it or the robin sings. Robbers can live in a cave because their home needs no ornamentation. Their hearts can not be a mirror of nature. Aside from the inquiry about the relations of beauty to morals, the sentiment remains as a most powerful motive of human existence. What an army of mortals of all ages and conditions will set forth soon for what is called their summer diversion! As property and education grow in volume, this army grows in multitude. A part of the throng travel forth for unworthy purposes, some to attend gaming resorts, some to find haunts of the most extreme and the most foolish fashions, but it is comforting to think that the majority will move forth that they may be in the presence of what is sublimest or sweetest in the scenery of our little star. These many minds separate at the start and choose many paths, but each path will be found leading to a mountain range East or West, or to an ocean or a fragrant pine forest, or leading further away to where glacier or midnight sun or an Arctic summer can smite the mysterious strings of the heart.

---

Many of the Arctic expeditions came from the love of beauty concealed under the name of science. When Sir John Franklin was a youth, he walked twelve miles upon a holiday that he might see the ocean. He reversed the sentence of Cæsar. He went, he saw, he was conquered. The land lost all charms. He fell in love with the sea. When only sixteen he is seen fighting with Lord Nelson in the battle of the Baltic; when twenty he is far away in the awful battle of Trafalgar; when six years more has passed he is seen sailing in the Gulf of Mexico to attack the city of New Orleans. His first wife was a poetess; his second wife a heroine in spirit. This was the kind of science that lay under the Arctic voyage. Under the expedition of Elisha Kent Kane lay the same demands of a highly poetic nature, and when one reads the later voyage of the Jeanette, one finds that a large part of the science consists in finding how near flowers will bloom to a band of snow and how soon a long, almost nightless, day can cover the frozen zone with rich verdure. As under the ancient Argonaut expedition lay the alluring beauty of the Golden Fleece, so under much of modern sailing and excavating lies the same motive, and the beauty which stands associated with morals stands also as an inspiration of science.

---

As in the sailing ships of Franklin, Kane, and old Jason, the motive of beauty is seen, thus it enters into the isolated minds which are soon to look outward for some reward from the external world. Whether the favor demanded is permission to move among the works of art or the ruins of the classic period, or only to revisit the home, the orchard made

dear by childhood, or only to pass out of the noise and struggle of the city, the demands all come from this one and the same passion of the human race

It has been estimated that certain millions of dollars will be given to Europe this summer by American wanderers. Other millions will be spent by American tourists or resting ones in their own land. Only two grounds of lament are visible—the one that this money could not be spent by a greater number of persons; the other, that some of those millions of dollars will not be spent in the pursuit of real beauty. But after these two regrets have been expressed it will remain true that the search for real wonders and splendors is a pursuit that merits the spending of much gold. The pursuit must be reckoned a part of that education which fashions mankind, and the Nation which spends one hundred millions a year in its free schools for the children must be expected to spend gold for the higher culture of its adult citizens. To the little child a school book is essential, but to the adult mind there are few books that can compare with the planet earth and the space in which it floats. One of the merits of early education is found in its enabling the mind to study and comprehend its world. The book on astronomy is able to make the midnight sky greater in all after years; the books on language and of language help the mind rise to the creation and expression of the soul's best possible emotions. A large part of the money thus spent each summer is poured out in the name of human culture and a high happiness, and once deemed by the ascetics a great waste, it must now be estimated as spent in the name of a most lawful motive of life. In the divine book we are taught that man is something more than food, drink, and raiment, that he is also an intellectual and spiritual being; and, if so, it need not be wondered at if often his mind and spirit cost him much more than his clothes. It would be confessed a wonderful reform if the poor and the wage-earners of the great cities should spend for some kind of beauty what they spend for ruinous drink. Of course the essentials of life would offer to them a better object than beauty, but the money spent for strong drink stands almost alone in its inability to add anything to either the clothes or the soul.

---

That Solomon who so long ago sounded the praises of this sentiment added a qualifying clause, the neglect of which is the error and sin of all generations. "All things beautiful in their time," means all things in their proper quantity and proper place. Having found that he may live for mountains, oceans, flowers, music and all art, man is compelled to inquire how much of life he may offer at these shrines? No rule can be given. It is certain that the problem of quantity must always be in waiting before the judgment. The lady may desire to have a tuberose in the room, but she does not desire to have a thousand of those fragrant cups. Incense may be burned at some hour, but for many hours the air from heaven is better without any touch of rose or sandal-wood. A shower of rain can better sweeten it.

Philosophers find two difficulties in nature — the one is, how to start a motion, the the other is, how to stop it. When it was proposed first to run railway trains rapidly, Chancellor Livingston said they could not displace the canal, because a rapid train could not be stopped at a given, exact point for receiving and discharging passengers and freight. Thus, all through nature and life, reappear the twin problems of starting a power and of bringing it to rest. In the railway department our age has triumphed, but having put into motion this enormous force of beauty, few are the individuals who can wave the hand and bring it to a halt. Christ loved the lilies and the sparrows, and, no doubt, more deeply still the home and hills of Bethlehem, but he could in any moment pass over to the world of work and sorrow. But many of his disciples start after the lilies and can never come back, never look to the right nor left afterward. They forget that a railway train would be of no value if it could never be stopped. The difficulty with balloon travel lies in the uncertainty of the route the voyager will take or where he will land. Thus our age may make of its æsthetics a balloon which will carry it whither it should not go, and let it fall in the sea or some desert. There was once a classic people which thus was borne aloft, but when they came down they were in the camp of Rome, with Goth and Vandal also not far away.

---

History and biography more than intimate that the sentiment of the beautiful must be forever under the eye of reason, because the moment its work passes out of a certain confine it becomes a deformity. As in literature, a thought will bear well some delicate decoration, but will be ruined if it is made to wear a whole wardrobe of adjectives, thus in all the days and scenes of a human life there must be a perpetual discrimination as to what is called pleasure, because that which is beautiful is such only in its time. That rose easily fades.

In this kingdom wealth and moderate means are both one. The land of beauty is more democratic than any political republic. To the John Franklin who walked twelve miles to the sea it was as sublime as it ever has been to any one who has approached it in a chariot. When the tourists meet in the valley of the Yosemite there is one grandeur to the man worth millions and to the school-teacher who has traveled on half-fare. And when pathetic music plays, the tears do not fall according to wealth or titles but according to the hearer's heart. There is one beauty for king and subject, mistress and maid.

Up from the tremendous fact of a sentiment rise some inferences of no little worth. God having Himself possessed the sentiment, and having made a beautiful world, man being granted the same taste, he is impelled by it to create a second universe; his own lesser world of art, and thus is man made a worker and a creator. He is not an animal simply, using a world; he is also a creator, able to amplify the God-made home. To follow his God secures him an infinite task.

---

It may also be inferred that man was not evolved from spontaneous life, for although use, utility, and the survival of the fittest might explain the needful organs and implements of the animal realm, they can not explain why man should be anxious to see a cataract or a mountain or an orange grove in bloom. The sentiment of the beautiful takes man away from the shop of chemical evolution and hands him over to some origin full of love and thought.

Inasmuch as this physical beauty of earth is always pointing toward what is called spiritual charm; as the lilies of Judea were only material images of Christ himself; as some characters are said to be white as snow; as each height of mountain stands for some height of mind, and each broad sea recalls some breadth of soul, thus may it be that this whole life is a material forerunner of something more spiritual and higher, and that all the beauties upon earth are so many promises of something more infinite and more lasting in some other sphere. To no one has this emotion reached an end and perfection in this world. Noble as our world is, it has always been to even its best minds only a suggestion. It has never been a fulfillment, but only a divine prophesy. We have all come into a world where Christ died. Shall we ever come to a world in which Christ lives? for the life of Christ and man is more beautiful than their death.

THE CHRIST-MOTIVE.

VIII.

THE CHRIST MOTIVE.

Each age manufactures for itself terms of new import though not always of new form. The painters have taken up the word "feeling," and have made it do a new kind of duty in expressing the purpose of the artist and the sentiment of the spectator. The word "motive" has also been enlarged by the musicians, and now stands for the kind of emotions which the musician and his auditor should experience in their many relations to the varied language of sounds. When one has listened long to these terms, as used by the devotees of art, one may well ask if a similar devotion might not find in religion such a fact as the Christ-motive. Why not? In the Wagnerian music the great composer assumes that certain tones and a certain movement will better awaken the idea of fire, or of war, or defeat, than other tones would awaken the special emotion. The tones which are specially fitted for a given result are called a "motive." They move all minds in the one direction. It is probable that were the religious world as industrious and deep as the students of art, it would find a use for the term Christ-motive — a potency contained in Him alone.

In essence, the Nazarene differs so widely from the influential names of both ancient and modern times that he would seem to demand and merit the distinction of being a special momentum for all looking or listening hearts. If a composer was able to devise a special kind of music that should always awaken the thought of spears, or giants, or love, or hate, with what kind of tones would that master have expressed the coming of Christ out of the wilderness and his entering upon the task of living and dying for the human race? Evidently, Christ lived out a phase of life that had been unusual; and its originality was no greater than its sublimity. It was so far removed from the pictures given to society by the military chieftains, the scholars, and kings, that it could express itself only by making use of the name of the being who lived it. The follower of Christ was called a Christian, so far removed was he from the likeness of all his neighbors. When Pliny and Tacitus alluded to the Christians, they could point out several particulars in which those disciples of the new Leader differed from all the common millions under the Roman flag. The image was not beautiful to those Pagan writers, but it was unique.

---

Our age could, should it make the effort, read the meaning of Jesus of Nazareth better than it was read by the Jews around him; better than it was read by Thomas a'Kempis, who spent his life in writing and acting "The Imitation of Christ." Time is a great light bearer. Modern statesmen can see liberty and education and industry more clearly than their ancestors saw those entities. As the steam engine is more appreciated to-day than it was in its first years, so all truths and personages unfold in long time. That process of ripening which is seen in the fields of fruits and grains is seen in the spiritual world as well, and, therefore, it should not surprise us if Christ is more clearly seen by the nineteenth century than he was seen by the first.

The time required for the ripening of a truth depends upon the quality of the truth which waits for recognition. If it comes in opposition to many ideas and persons that have long held power among men, it must move slowly. As a steam vessel, sailing among icebergs or in a harbor full of other ships, must run at quarter speed, because it must wait for so many obstacles to be removed from the way and for so many signals to be given and to be answered, so, when a new idea is launched, it can not at once move forward with full power because its sea is not open, but, rather, is it exceedingly full of small and great craft. The obstacles to a scientific thought have been, generally, great enough to be discouraging, but they stand dwarfed by the obstacles which lie in the path of a moral proposition. The telegraph and railway came slowly, indeed, but they almost ran when compared with the creeping speed at which freedom came to mankind. It took the telegraph a third of a century to win any favor, but it takes hundreds of years for an England to fling aside her crown. She is gradually removing it from her brow. While that crown is moving a half inch science travels a hundred miles.

---

The coming of Christ was not the advent of a scientific truth, but it was the effort of a new moral philosophy to enter and pervade a world. It was difficult for those then living, to know what such a character as Jesus could possibly mean. To admit him was to reject much.

When it was proposed that the earth was a round body, the idea was received with laughter, for, said the laughing public, if the world were round and in motion, the objects would fall off as the ball should turn. The idea of a globular earth, made a change necessary in other ideas; as to what held objects to even the upper surface of the earth. Thus to admit a new truth was to admit a score of cognate notions, and to destroy as many of those which had long prevailed among men. Thus for Christ to come was for many other persons to go away. He came into conflict with many rules, beliefs and customs.

---

From the smallness of the multitude which Pilate found for Christ in the final hour of trial and condemnation, it is to be inferred that the points of conflict between the Nazarene and the Roman Age were very numerous and grave. Many points have, no doubt, fallen out of history, or rather failed ever to get into its embalmmnt. As we cannot now travel back the little distance, and find all the reasons why Elizabeth should have executed the Queen of Scots, or why Henry VIII should have felt murder to be such a family necessity, cannot travel back the long distance and see why Athens did not find ample room for Socrates in her streets, thus are we unable to find all the objections which Rome and Judea raised to the character and works of such a personage as the Son of Man. The ill-repute of a Nazarene, the simplicity of Christ's toilet, his spirit of equality, his kindness to children, his high morality, his attachment to God, his hope of Heaven, his very gentleness, may all be combined with a group of allegations now wholly lost, to make the populace hurry him away to the cross. History was not written then as it is written now. Only the greatest lives were noted down with any fulness. Compared with the life of modern statesmen, the biography of even Julius Cæsar is only a dim shadow of a passing greatness. From such a period the life of Christ comes to us with many a chapter left out. Only a line is drawn where the world would now love to see a whole forehead with all its color and all its lines of care. The whole scene is cast in deep shadow, in which valuable details, beautiful or sad, are forever lost.

---

For the purpose of illustration, let us assume that Jesus came into conflict with his age at a full score of points. It would then be logical to assume that half of those points were so local and transient as never to enter into history. There may have been personal ill-will toward Christ, cherished by men whose sins he had rebuked, or whose popularity he had lessened. Herod carried a personal dislike to John; the copper-smiths hated Paul and Silas. It is not known, therefore, what were all the causes which carried Christ to the cross. Many hands are now unseen.

Of the known ones, the fear of a new religion, the fear of a new claimant for a throne, the longing of the Jews for a military chieftain, the non-combatant, peace-loving nature of Christ, his preference for a spiritual kingdom, of which a large part should be beyond the grave, one by one these have all faded, until almost no trace remains of what once made the Son of Man objectionable to the age in which he lived and died. The clouds which once blinded the eyes of a whole epoch and made it exultingly lead the Man of Nazareth up to the dreadful Golgotha, have all passed away, and left the sky of truth more serene in our nation than it was in the day of the Apostles. What might be called the Christ-motive is doubtless more visible to our age than it was to the myriads, amid which that life was lived.

It was apparently incredible to Judas Iscariot that his master would not escape from the hands of his foes. Judas wished to make money slyly out of some miracle. The two disciples on the way to Emmaus, expressed their disappointment in Christ's death; they had hoped he was suddenly to expand into a king. Peter had denied all relationship with the man. Thus hearts the meanest and hearts the purest were wholly unable to grasp a kingdom which was to sweep far beyond Judea and Rome; a kingdom which was to draw impulse from the very cross upon which the disciples thought the leader had surrendered his cause; unable were they to conceive of an empire which should make its home, not among a few years, but among the centuries. With many of the disciples three years had begun and ended the work of their Lord; but now it is known that eighteen centuries were not to exhaust a single doctrine he uttered, or a single quality of soul he revealed. No blame can rest upon those disciples for not seeing the greatness of their office. How could they see in three years what the subsequent 1800 years have only partly revealed? No man is greater than his age permits him to be. Among the disciples lay a world and a future no greater than themselves. As America was outside of their geography, so was a slow and far-reaching Savior beyond their religious dream.

---

---

Men who can look back have an advantage over those who can look only forward. For this reason, age is intellectually greater than youth. Youth has more of enthusiasm and poetry, but its facts are fewer and are held with a gentler grasp. Age sees the world more truly, because it has passed over it. It has not skimmed along above it as though high up in clouds, but over each square yard of the low and high ground has it moved, and often with bleeding feet. Thus the large world has its age, and now our century can look back upon Christ with a clearer vision than that with which the first century looked at him, in great Jerusalem or in little Nazareth. It can see the deeds and character of Christ, passing along among the generations as they came and went; can hear all those words of eloquence sounding, where Augustine and his mother talked and prayed, in the fourth century, and where Madame Guyon sang in the seventeenth. If a few Jews hearing once this Teacher said, "He spake as never man spake," much more can this era make the same affirmation, for it can ask the witness of more centuries, and can follow the words into the inner recesses of more hearts. It looks into those words from the experience of eighteen centuries.

---

The Christ-motive becomes each age more visible. The Christ-impulse has been made more clear by a constant differentiation. The non-essential and the wholly irrelevant have died, or are dying on the long route. There is no fear of a king who might rival the Cæsars; for time has placed all those throne-holders beyond the reach of rivalry. While the empires and republics have been rising and falling, the world has been learning the meaning of a spiritual kingdom that can flourish within an empire or a republic, and can redouble the value of either limited monarchy or of liberty. What enhances now the worth of England's royalty, or America's equality, is the presence of that spiritual emporium, which is contained within the monarchy and the republic. Instead of coming to destroy Cæsar it is now seen that the more of the Christ-truth there is in a nation the more lasting the throne or the republic. Of such an empire within an empire, the disciples themselves could have had no conception. When their master said: "Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's," the words must have seemed to them only the language of temporary prudence. They thought the morrow would end such a kindness of speech. But the morrow came, and on went the governments of man; but within their confines slowly arose the dominion of the Spirit. Russia's Czar would wear his crown more peacefully to-day were the kingdom of Christ within the kingdom of all the Russias. Siberia would not anger the world, Poland would not be a second shame, the Nihilists would never have come into their unhappy being.

---

---

Thus time has destroyed the reasons in part for which the Nazarene was crucified. Instead of being an enemy of any de facto state, he brought a philosophy which could have conferred upon any republic or kingdom the charm of perpetual youth.

Isolated thus from any war upon the state, Christ stands isolated also from the reproach which his simplicity of origin and of raiment, and which his womanly gentleness brought. It is only recent time that has been able to do justice to the soul in itself considered. There has been in late generations a wonderful array of witnesses, whose testimony has exalted peace and simplicity, and has pushed back not a little the entire pomp and circumstance of the past. Citizens going into the presence of the Queen of England, are attired as amazing soldiers of some past age. With head erect and with rattling sword, the modern advances toward the person in power; but the form is full of public laughter, because all hearts know that all such external trappings are only a childish memory of foolish days. The mind and heart are the emblems of modern greatness. Our age finds no objection to the simple dress and simple life of Jesus. All these terms, such as "Carpenter's son," "Man from Nazareth," have been emptied of their significance, and the Christ-impulse having escaped from the jealousy of the Cæsars, has escaped also from the old worshipers of purple and scarlet.

---

Our age would now ask Christ to come as he came.

Having escaped from its early enemies, the second great success of this impulse was its escape from its friends. The first friends of Jesus were disappointed that he declined to be a military leader, and that his heart was fixed more upon immortality than upon time. Those first friends cannot be reproached, for it has taken the world many centuries to learn that war is an awful error, and that the genius of the world ought to be peace. The peaceful years that are now passing over all the western nations—years, in which France, Germany, England, and indeed all the states, large and small, are mending their fortunes, tilling their fields, building their homes, are eloquent commentaries upon his wisdom, who said “the peace-makers are blessed,” who commanded a military disciple to put up his sword. What once seemed a weakness in the character of Christ is now confessed to be proof of his deep wisdom.

Nor is it any longer an objection to Christ that his kingdom lay not wholly in time, but also partly beyond the flood. That the suffering Jews longed for an earthly Savior was pardonable; for they had been trampled under foot for many long centuries. The crimes committed against their holy city had made all patriotic hearts long for an invincible king. Heaven, so far as thought of, was dim and far away. Jerusalem and Judea were the burden of all Jewish thought. Never lived there a people more attached to their own nation. All their laws and customs, those of religion, those of politics proper, their exclusiveness, their race-pride, their special relations to Jehovah, made that land surpass in patriotic attachments all the peoples that have ever lived. "If I forget thee, Oh Jerusalem! let my right hand forget its cunning" were words not spoken of heaven, but of that earthly region which flowed with milk and honey. The barbarians and the Romans who had so often desecrated their country, made the Jews look into the face of each male child, to see if perhaps the promised Savior had at last come. To such a throng it was only an offense that a person talking of peace and heaven should attempt to fulfill the predictions of their prophets and gratify their sense of historic justice. Only a little group could accept of a Jerusalem beyond the grave. The vast majority derided the strange kind of Savior, and said: Let him be crucified.

---

Since that day many generations have passed, and all forms of triumphant generals have come and gone. Some have come, bringing liberty to the white race, some liberty to the black, but whatever they have done for mankind they have done nothing to lessen the need of a fatherland beyond the closing scene of this life. The more man triumphs upon Earth, triumphs in education, in morals, in friendship, in every attribute of humanity, the more inadequate does earth become, and the more he needs the outlook of the endless world. What would it have availed the Jews had Jesus led the Hebrews to an earthly triumph? Rome was led to triumph, but what did that splendor accomplish for those who lived in its noonday? Victory and defeat are one now in that dust-covered past. What was once the reproach of Christ is now his glory; for if there is one Leader the modern world needs, it is one who can lead to immortality. The mind of man has outgrown the confines of time. He takes his studies, his longings, his worship, his friendships, all in his arms and bowing before his Creator, he humbly asks for a second life. He does not claim it as a right, he simply appeals to God's love. The very education of society has imperiled its peace. Each generation of culture makes this world less complete. No earthly state can ever be glorious enough in peace, arts and justice to obliterate from the heart the hope of a still better land beyond the tomb. What was once the reproach of Christ, that he had not come to batter down Roman walls, and place the crown upon the sons of Solomon and David, has now become his glory; for crowns and republics fade to us all in three and thirty years, and in such kingdoms and republics the more of education and refinement, the more at last of sorrow. Therefore the Christ-motive of a land beyond earth, has cast aside all its deformity and will gather power and beauty with the advance of the human heart. It is grander in the present than it was in the past.

---

The Christ-impulse stands thus improved by a growing isolation. It is a wonderful piece of public good fortune that the same intellectual progress which has made the age so powerful to attack the Christian system, has made the friends of the system powerful to discover and cast away a large amount of irrelevant matter. The Christ-motive is an isolated, self-adequate strain in this religious music. Those theologians who for generations attempted to make it sound in harmony with the shrill notes of Moses, or afterward with the harsh notes of Tertullian and Calvin, have detected the discord, and now the peculiar tones of the Christ-theme are sounded alone, and a melody overwhelmed by the debates and martyrdoms and battle cries of the past fall in a new sweetness upon the present and the future.

If any young or older mind is finding the task grievous of carrying in the intellect, and in the heart that great bulk, called the

---

Christian System, that mind may find rest and peace by casting aside many an Abraham, many a Solomon, many a Calvin, many a Luther, many a name and flag of many a sect, and by drawing nearer to the one Christ-impulse. It is one of those tones which is so sweet and sublime, that the listener asks all choruses and accompaniments to be hushed, that the heart may hear only the long wished for accents. To be filled, to be carried away with that one Christ-motive, that is Christianity, that is religion, that is salvation.

THE NEW IMAGINATION;

A NEW IMPULSE OF LIFE.

IX.

THE NEW IMAGINATION ; A NEW IMPULSE OF LIFE.

Many persons are troubled because imagination seems to have declined. Where, they lament, are those brains which once could smite upon our planet and make giants, fairies, and goddesses come forth? Whither have all those minds gone who once could so people the air, sky, woods, and waters with powerful or beautiful forms of rational life? No one remains to see the doves of Noah bringing him olive leaves, nor the doves of Virgil alighting upon a branch of solid gold; no one sees the ravens carrying food to Elijah, nor hears the dying swan sing a farewell to earth. Neither the modern Cæsar nor his high priest watches the flight of the pigeons to see whether the Ides of March are laden with evil. The trees have ceased meeting to choose a king, and have cared little for the harp of any modern Orpheus. The mistletoe of the oak has lost its sacred relation to the Druid's god, and the oaks of Dodona no longer ring into listening ears any words of prophecy. The autumn leaves under our feet no longer carry the detached predictions of the raving sibyl. Gone are all the Homers, the Dantes, the Miltons, and the John Bunyans.

An Atlantis was, indeed, sunk, but the equilibrium of nature has been preserved, for the sinking of Atlantis has pressed upward a new continent, as a sinking wave makes a similar wave rise by its side.

There is little danger that man will ever lose his imagination. There is little danger that culture will ever render the mind incapable of adding up figures and of reasoning from premises to a conclusion, incapable of memory or hope; and no greater is the danger that the imagination of man has gone away or is meditating an exit from our world. No great department of the soul is liable to withdraw from the wonderful brotherhood of faculties. What we have found, and must still more expect, is a change of the subject-matter upon which the imagination is plying and will ply its precious art. For each piece of imagery that has disappeared some new piece has come. The kind of wonders which Homer saw — invincible warriors, magic sword and spear, a coat of mail made by Vulcan, Cyclops, Harpy, Circe, with her enchantments; Ulysses, changed from a ragged beggar to a colossal king, have fallen out of men's hands because those hands were daily becoming more full of new images of things in heaven and upon earth. The imagination is not dying, it is only changing its pictures. Our school teachers all made us distinguish between fancy and imagination. Fancy was said to be the more playful art. It made Queen Mab ride in a chariot made of a nutshell,

---

“Made by the joiner, squirrel, or old grub.”

It made the animals of Æsop speak like sages; it made the cicada dance in summer and beg food of the ant in winter; but when some more serious work was spread out in prose or verse or art, when some hero like Achilles or Hector moved before us in all the similitude of a vast truth, then, said our teachers, this is imagination. Æsop dealt in fancy, Sophocles and Milton in imagination.

But all that teaching went to show that there is in the mind a permanent image-making power, but that the fashion of the objects change. The faculty which built up Achilles and gave him an impenetrable coat of mail no longer likes its great warrior and could not now be persuaded to create a similar form of manhood. Milton's "Paradise Lost" could not now be produced. Imagination remaining one and the same, its images change under the influence of an age, and the same painter in the soul that sketched yesterday the angel Ariel moves to-day to a new canvas and delineates a new form of fallen or unfallen soul. Fancy would seem to be the childhood of imagination. As little children can make a horse out of a stick and wagons out of spools, but as the older minds wish the horse and wagon to be more real, thus fancy rises up to imagination and fades away as fancy to become a truer picture; imagination asks for more and more of truthfulness as reason and education hasten forward. Imagination is not a falsifying faculty. It loves to take pictures of some hidden reality, but it never makes well-known deformity sit for beauty, nor a known falsehood sit for a truth. When Milton made his pictures of the celestial and infernal realms, they were thought by the Christian world to be probable copies of the real facts. The creations of the "Paradise Lost" lay within the easy reach of the public belief; but to our age, the council which met in hell to lay plans for the ruin of Adam and Eve, and from which council Satan went as a foreign emissary of evil, are ideas so incredible that in order to work at such pictures imagination would need to fall back to childish fancy. Milton's war in heaven, where cannons roared and where swords gleamed, were near the truth as perceived in the mind that was just emerging from those dark ages in which Luther threw an inkstand at Satan and in which the Roman Church saw devils afterward conducting the funeral of Luther. In these latter years, all that scenery is so far away from the truth that imagination has withdrawn from that realm; but not to die, but to work once more in the empire of what is more real. The dog Cerberus could bark in Homer and Virgil and Milton, because that "hell-hound" came within the common bounds of public faith, but imagination in these years compels that three-mouthed barking monster to pass away, because that faculty never rears its structure upon straw, upon well-known falsehoods, but upon the solid stones of truth. Much of past imagination has become fancy now, and a new task comes to employ the poetic powers of our profounder age.

---

---

Those who are lamenting that mental imagery has been killed by the business of the age must be mistaking the objects of imagination for the faculty itself. Many old objects have died. The entire pathway of man lies strewn with the ruins of the buildings reared by Homer, ruins of the ships that sailed for the Golden Fleece, ruins of Calypso's grotto, ruins of the palaces which once arose from Aladdin's lamp, ruins of the helmets which made the knight invisible and of the lances that were irresistible, but instead of dying along with these objects the creative mind has covered all these ruins over with fresh flowers.

The old pictures all remain in literature to be revisited when the heart wishes to change the scene of its meditation and pleasure; and many are the hours when all prefer to go back and tarry a while where birds uttered warnings and words of cheer and where trees danced for the lute. Nothing has been taken away. What change then has come? Has not the pursuit of wealth ruined the creative powers of the intellect? The most evident change has been brought along by the growth of reason. A reasoning power has come which has taken the charm away from childish fancy and redoubled the charm of the highest and deepest truth. The spiritual powers all follow the greatest paths of their special time. As reason no longer loves to inquire: What is the Trinity? What is space? What is time? but would prefer to ask: What is man? What is education? What is happiness? so the imagination does not go with its old eagerness to paint a Cerberus or a Cyclops, it feels the new pressure of the new period, and would select its subjects from the riches of the new world. But the passing world is remarkable in this one thing, that it is occupied wholly by man. The nymphs, goddesses, giants, ghosts and imps have all passed away. Here toils and rests, dwells and studies, weeps and laughs, only the one family, that of man; and, therefore, that imagination which once roved so widely now finds its themes within the confines of human life. Hither came slowly but surely the whole volume of modern thought, and the creative soul which once was busy about the marvelous of the olden time, at last hangs with deeper thought over that which is the most marvelous now. If Gray's elegy in the country churchyard differs from any hundred lines of Homer or Virgil, the difference comes not from any decline of poetic power, but because our age thinks more about the solemn scenes of human life than it ponders over the legends of Achilles and Æneas. Neither Homer nor Virgil ever produced such a picture as that delineated in the hundred or more lines of Thomas Gray. They possess no superior in all the volumes of antiquity. In these stanzas imagination does not need to borrow any magical arms or divinities or supernatural situations; the setting sun, the curfew bell, the lowing herds, the ivy mantled towers, the children climbing on the parents' knee, "the boast of heraldry, the pomp of power," the "storied ten," the "madding crowd," all are so woven together that there is no room and no wish for any importation from the classic land or from the old Orient. The simple truths are so picked up from common human life, and so set into one beauty and one eloquence that, read along with these modern lines, the poems from the old wonderland become empty of the richest and highest significance.

---

---

Thus, within the borders of man's actual life, lies the poetry of Robert Burns, Mrs. Browning, and, indeed, the entire modern school of the highest thought. All modern verses begin and end in man. All the poems we know by heart are those of friendship, love, memory, patriotism, and religion, because the world is so occupied by man himself that we learn nothing by heart except that which lies very near the human well-being. The poetic element of society changes to meet the new concern of every statesman and philanthropist, and that creative art which once sketched a legend or a fable now sits down among the vicissitudes of humanity. Are we to say that the present has lost the old and high attributes when it is the first age that ever reproduced in its own heart the sufferings of the exiles in Siberia? the soldiers and slaves of a despot? and the common sorrows of the poor women and children? Instead of being deficient in imagination, this is probably the first period that ever used its highest faculties for the perception and inculcation of the highest truths.

To create the character of Lucile or Evangeline demands as much genius as is required to sketch the Laocoon or a Hercules or a Miltonian fiend or angel. The imagination of Dickens in his words of benevolence is as great as was that of Cervantes or Eugene Sue, the difference being only in the quality of the creations — the people in the stories of Dickens being all related to the greater happiness of the widespread poor.

While the Miltonian genius and Dantean genius were building up their gorgeous palaces, women were publicly whipped for petty offences with no limit to the blows except that they must be laid on until the naked back was bloody. In all these years, when Milton and Shakespeare were making such poetic flights, prisoners in jail slept upon boards or the floor, not even straw being furnished; no clothing allowed, except what might belong to the prisoner, no fire furnished in winter. To such horrible jails were added cages like those for holding wild beasts; stocks, many there were in each village, and whipping posts at all points. In that long period the high poetic and religious sentiments were finding their themes away from the confines of the actual human race. There were sensibility and refinement, but they were modified by their surroundings and were wholly suspended as to man. Queen Elizabeth was herself full of imagination as to some kinds of poetry, full of imagination as to how a jeweled stomacher would look or how a certain marvellous collar would set off her haughty but otherwise empty head; but to these and a coarse life and indelicate speech she added a cruelty that would in our age find parallel only in some few of those hospital officials who have recently betrayed toward the insane and the helpless the ferocity of the Inquisition. Here and there in an asylum or hospital now existing can be seen the barbarism which once covered our world all over and which broke limbs on the rack and flogged men and women to death while the poems of Dante, Shakespeare and Milton were passing through the air like music. The most common phenomenon now is imagination making the pictures of love.

What is modern philanthropy but the advent of a poetry that can feel the calamities of another? Philanthropy is an imagination that can picture another's pain. The physicians who ply their art in asylums should be not only physicians, but also the poets of love and mercy. A medical diploma confers no fitness for practice among the poor and helpless. To the diploma of medical science must be added one signed by the merciful name of Jesus Christ and by the tenderness of the human heart. Often physicians are the most heartless of all characters, for, wherever their rudeness was in excess before they studied their art, they found in their surgery and experiments only a further development of their insensibility.

This science and practice make a hard heart harder, but also a kind nature still more kind. But, aside from all theories, none but the minds the wisest and hearts the kindest should ever even sweep the floor of a hospital or an asylum. Founded in the name of mercy, mercy alone should ever touch foot within such sacred walls.

The philanthropy which is making the Christian nations so much better implies nothing so clearly as that man's power to draw images has begun to seek those images in a new field of objective forms. No fancy is more powerful than that which can put you in a sufferer's place. It has long been the privilege of the mind to put itself into the place of warriors, heroes, lovers, orators and poets. Often, when man is young and well and music is sounding, the heart can, in a half hour of rapture, move through all the forms of exalted life and pass from hero to orator and from orator to a throne as easily as Dante and Beatrice went from star to star in heaven; but the triumph of the picture-art comes when the mind can drop downward and put itself in the place of the man who is overtaken by illness and poverty at once; in the place of the boy who stands with bare feet in the snow that covers the grave of his mother. That faculty called creative force will never be complete while it can only cast itself into the bosom of greatness to live its emblazoned life; it must be able, also, to feel the lash that falls upon a dumb brute, and to read the wide-open eyes of an orphan girl who does not yet know the possible blackness of her eighteenth year. The whole import of the word imagination is that it must picture to us what we have not and are not; that our world may be greater than ourself. The heart that has no imagination dwells in a world that is only five or six feet long, and that weighs only one or two hundred pounds; the heart that has imaginations lives in immensity. The ocean which is a thousand miles away is its ocean, the birds which are singing in all the woods of America are in its own grove, all the triumphs of man are its triumphs, and the sorrows of society draw its many and warm tears. This is the philosophy of the word imagination. It stands for that overflow of the heart that changes at last a fountain into a great river. It helps the glittering dewdrop to become a sun. It makes man live in immensity and immortality.

---

It is difficult to measure the quantity of poetic power in a given age. It may be that our age possesses a smaller quantity than was allowed to some of the literary spots in the past, but it must be confessed a piece of good fortune that this age, which so seeks and finds wealth, should be the one that prefers the scenes of benevolence to those of the old and grotesque fancy. It is, at least, a singular coincidence that the age of greed and of humanity should have met in one of the highways of time; that the Germans, the English, the Americans who can see farthest the glitter of the precious metals, can also write the best literature and religion of life and can soonest of all times reach out to the unfortunate a helping hand. Wealth like modern wealth once ruined Persia, Egypt, Rome and Spain. This wave of ruin is now kept back, perhaps, by the new poetry of the age — the poetry, not of giants and goddesses, but of the human race.

---

Our millionaires may not be wise and famous as critics of Greek and all ancient sculpture, but it is matter of profound joy that they would rather see a statue of two ragged boys taking their first lesson under a loving teacher in a free school of common education or art or religion than gaze at the Laocoon in Rome. The "Twin serpents from Tenedos" twisting around those human figures are not so full of ideas nor of such grand ideas as would spring up over this more modern group. Ancient art dealt more in the beauty of the body, while modern art deals more in the attributes of the soul.

Much of the complaint against modern taste as being dead or dull comes not from the fact that it is dead in its sentiments, but that it is dead to the old past. The heart is warm as ever, and stands impassioned in the presence of beauty, but the objects of beauty must be taken in part from the times that encompass our paths and our homes. The past must not be destroyed. Not a leaf must be broken from the wreath of Bacchus, not a finger harmed in the statue of a goddess or a saint, but the new mind now in the world must be permitted to pass from the wreaths of Bacchus to those of liberty and religion, and from the rosy neck of Venus to the more spiritual splendor of the human family.

Imagination dying! It can not die, for it is almost the entire human soul. It is never for an hour absent from any high mind. It comes each noon to picture the evening; comes each evening to make an outline sketch of the next day; comes in midwinter to hold spring up before the heavy heart; it comes in May with its offerings of June's deeper beauty; it makes the heart an urn into which it empties uncounted treasures; it makes of it a perpetual gallery of art, where the pictures of the past hang among those of the present and the future. This imagination dying! It is just now beginning to live! It practiced upon the foreheads of the non-existing that, after school days had passed, it might sit down by the existing human race where real joys and griefs could come; it carried its offerings to a hundred deities who were encamped upon Olympus or were hunting sacred deer in holy forests, but only to fit itself at last for casting down its gold, frankincense and myrrh before an object more real and for bowing at the throne of the one true and infinite God.

It was the defect of the Mosaic age that those who came near the Hebrew God had to veil their faces so as not to see him in all or a tenth of his beauty. Paul announced a great change as having come. As a man can look into a mirror and see his own face, thus may he with face unveiled come into the presence of his God; as though in a glass see all that divine splendor, and may gaze at it until the human features mingle with the divine or until man seems changed into the same image from glory to glory as if lifted upward by the omnipotent hand.

Thus have many human faculties, reason, religious faith, and imagination moved along so veiled that the objects they should have seen clearly were poorly seen and poorly loved, but now the veil is being rent and plucked from the eye, and the oneness and the goodness of God are more clearly seen, and the faces of a myriad of fanciful beings, supposed once to dwell in wood or by stream, all blend into one sweetness and one amazing and awful reality, that of man. Henceforth, with unveiled face, imagination must look into the great mirror of nature and see man and God—Creator and child, with features blending as though man came from heaven and was destined to go back to his home.

---

THE STANDARD OPERAS. Their Plots, their Music, and their Composers. By GEORGE P.
UPTON. 12mo, 371 pages, yellow edges, $1.50; extra gilt, gilt edges, $2.00.

In half calf, gilt top, . . . . .	$3 25
In half morocco, gilt top, . . . . .	3 50
In half morocco, gilt edges, . . . . .	3 75

---

“The summaries of the plots are so clear, logical and well written, that one can read them with real pleasure, which can not be said of the ordinary operatic synopses. But the most important circumstance is that Mr. Upton’s book is fully abreast of the times.”—The Nation (New York).

“Mr. Upton has performed a service that can hardly be too highly appreciated, in collecting the plots, music and the composers of the standard operas, to the number of sixty-four, and bringing them together in one perfectly arranged volume. . . . His work is one simply invaluable to the general reading public. Technicalities are avoided, the aim being to give to musically uneducated lovers of the opera a clear understanding of the works they hear. It is description, not criticism, and calculated to greatly increase the intelligent enjoyment of music.”—The Boston Traveller.

“Among the multitude of handbooks which are published every year, and are described by easy-going writers of book-notices as supplying a long-felt want, we know of none which so completely carries out the intention of the writer as ‘The Standard Operas,’ by Mr. George P. Upton, whose object is to present to his readers a comprehensive sketch of each of the operas contained in the modern repertory. . . . There are thousands of music-loving people who will be glad to have the kind of knowledge which Mr. Upton has collected for their benefit, and has cast in a clear and compact form.”—R. H. Stoddard, in “The Evening Mail and Express” (New York).

---

Sold by all booksellers, or mailed, post-paid, on receipt of price, by

A. C. McCLURG & CO., PUBLISHERS,

COR. WABASH AVE. AND MADISON ST., CHICAGO.

THE STANDARD ORATORIOS. Their Stories, their Music, and their Composers, A Handbook. By GEORGE P. UPTON. 12mo, 335 pages, yellow edges, $1.50; extra gilt, gilt edges, $2.

In half calf, gilt top, . . . . .	$3 25
In half morocco, gilt top, . . . . .	3 50
In half morocco, gilt edges, . . . . .	3 75

---

“Music lovers are under a new obligation to Mr. Upton for this companion to his “Standard Operas,”—two books which deserve to be placed on the same shelf with Grove’s and Riemann’s musical dictionaries.”—The Nation, New York.

“Mr. George P. Upton has followed in the lines that he laid down in his “Standard Operas,” and has produced an admirable handwork, which answers every purpose that such a volume is designed to answer.”—The Mail and Express, New York.

“Like the valuable art hand books of Mrs. Jamison, these volumes contain a world of interesting information, indispensable to critics and art amateurs. The volume under review is elegantly and succinctly written, and the subjects are handled in a thoroughly comprehensive manner.”—Public Opinion Washington.

“The book is a masterpiece of skilful handling, charming the reader with its pure English style, and keeping his attention always awake in an arrangement of matter which makes each succeeding page and chapter fresh in interest and always full of instruction, while always entertaining.”—The Standard, Chicago.

“The author of this book has done a real service to the vast number of people who, while they are lovers of music, have neither the leisure nor inclination to become deeply versed in its literature. . . . The information conveyed is of just the sort that the average of cultivated people will welcome as an aid to comprehending and talking about this species of musical composition.”—Church Magazine, Philadelphia.

---

Sold by all booksellers, or mailed, post-paid, on receipt of price, by

A. C. McCLURG & CO., PUBLISHERS.

COR. WABASH AVE. AND MADISON ST., CHICAGO.

THE STANDARD CANTATAS. Their Stories, Their Music, and Their Composers. A Handbook. By GEORGE P. UPTON. 12mo, 367 pages, yellow edges, $1.50; extra gilt, gilt edges, $2.00.

In half calf, gilt top, . . . . .	$3 25
In half morocco, gilt top, . . . . .	3 50
In half morocco, gilt edges, . . . . .	3 75

“It is the only handbook and guide for musicians and their friends, and is as valuable as either of the two admirable works preceding it.”—The Globe, Boston.

“Mr. Upton describes these cantatas very clearly. The book may be warmly commended to those who are fond of music as containing information which can be found in no other single work.”—The Chronicle, San Francisco.

“A new book from the pen of Mr. Upton, relating in any way to music, is sure to be welcomed, not only by musicians but by the general public, for he has a happy way of treating what most people consider a very dry subject in a most entertaining manner.”—The Chicago Tribune.

“The general reader of musical literature will find here an account of the principal cantatas, the stories upon which they are founded, the characteristics of the music, and brief sketches of the lives of the composers. The plan of the work is the same as that of the author’s handbooks on the standard operas and oratorios. His purpose is to furnish a guide to those not familiar with the field, rather than an exhaustive criticism for adepts in the science.”—The Home Journal, New York.

“A book that describes and analyzes the many cantatas of the world must therefore be a book that ranges through the wide realm of music. The author of the ‘Standard Cantatas’ appreciates the situation. He enters heartily into his work of definition, discrimination, biography, history, incident, explanation. Mr. Upton’s book is designed for lovers of music. . . It covers ground that has never been carefully worked and Mr. Upton does his task with fidelity, spirit, taste.”—The Illustrated Christian Weekly, New York.

Sold by all booksellers, or mailed, post-paid, on receipt of price, by

A. C. McCLURG & CO., PUBLISHERS,

COR. WAB SH AVE., AND MADISON ST. CHICAGO.

THE STANDARD SYMPHONIES. Their History, Their Music, and Their Composers. A Handbook. By GEORGE P. UPTON. 12mo, 321 pages, yellow edges, $1.50; extra gilt, gilt edges, $2.00.

In half calf, gilt top, . . . . .	$3 25
In half morocco, gilt top, . . . . .	3 50
In half morocco, gilt edges, . . . . .	3 75

“The usefulness of this handbook can not be doubted. Its pages are full of these fascinating renderings. The accounts of each composer are succinct and yet sufficient. The author has done a genuine service to the world of music lovers. The comprehension of orchestral work of the highest character is aided efficiently by this volume.”—Public Opinion, Washington.

“There has never been, in this country at least, so thorough an attempt to collate the facts of programme music. . . . As a definite helper in some cases and as a refresher in others we believe Mr. Upton’s book to have a lasting value. . . . The book, in brief, shows enthusiastic and honorable educational purpose, good taste, and sound scholarship.”—The American, Philadelphia.

“It is written in a style that can not fail to stimulate the reader, if also a student of music, to strive to find for himself the underlying meanings of the compositions of the great composers. It contains, besides a vast amount of information about the symphony, its evolution and structure, with sketches of the composers, and a detailed technical description of a few symphonic models. It meets a recognized want of all concert goers.”—The Chautauquan.

“The explanations of the meaning of the different movements in the symphonies, and of the various themes employed, are useful and instructive. Mr. Upton’s interpretations are as helpful as they are fascinating. For those who have not yet heard the compositions described, they are excellent guides toward a more intelligent understanding of the music. And even those already familiar with these compositions will find new suggestions in this volume, and will be interested in the interpretations, as clear and interesting expressions of impressions made on the author.”—The Epoch, New York.

Sold by all booksellers, or mailed, post-paid, on receipt of price, by

A. C. McCLURG & CO., PUBLISHERS,

COR. WABASH AVE. AND MADISON ST., CHICAGO.

New Edition, re-written and greatly enlarged.

---

WOMAN IN MUSIC.

BY GEORGE P. UPTON, Author of "The Standard Operas," etc.
16mo, 222 pages. Price, $1.00.

"Woman in Music," by George P. Upton, the author of "Standard Operas" and other valuable contributions to musical literature, is a novel venture in literature and full of interest and suggestion. Its facts and illustrations, drawn from unusually wide reading, are very fresh and curious, and the charming little brochure might justly be said to contain the romance of musical history.

It is divided into three parts. In the first, the author discusses the much vexed question why so few women have been gifted with musical creative power of the highest order, and traces the real relations of woman to music.

In the second part, the influence of woman in inspiring the highest musical composition is shown in a series of short biographical sketches of Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Chopin, Handel, Weber, and Wagner. This part of the work is specially interesting and valuable, as it is replete with information not generally accessible, and reveals to the world many highly romantic episodes, and pictures the domestic phases of the lives of the great composers.

In the third part, the relations of woman to the performance of vocal and instrumental music are considered, and numerous observations of value are given which the author has gathered from his many years of experience as a musical critic. In following out this part of his subject he briefly reviews the careers of the most noted queens of song of the last two centuries, and cites opinions of contemporary criticism.

An additional interest is given by an appendix containing a list of the prominent female composers of the past three centuries, and a list of the women to whom the great masters have dedicated their more important works.

The book is the result of a very wide gleaning in the out-of-the-way fields of musical literature, and will be very fascinating to all who are interested in the more romantic phases of musical history and biography.

Sold by all booksellers, or mailed, postpaid, on receipt of price by the publishers,

A. C. McCLURG & COMPANY,
Cor. Wabash Ave. and Madison St., Chicago.

“A very charming sketch of a most interesting character.”—Boston Congregationalist.

---

LIFE OF MOZART.

From the German of Dr. Louis Nohl. With portrait.

Price, $1.00.

“The work was well worthy of translation, for it is a model of short biography, containing all that the student need know to understand fully the works of the great composer. The translator has done his work in a very creditable manner, and the publishers have given it an appropriate dress.”—Traveller, Boston.

“The story of Mozart’s life is told in language that fascinates by a simplicity and directness which impart delightful color to the attending recital of facts. . . . We consider it advisable for every student in music to possess this book, for it is one of the most pleasing and instructive biographies of a musical composer that has been published for a long time. It is convenient in form and exquisitely tasteful in dress.”—Home Journal, Boston.

“It is scarcely possible to write about Mozart without some warmth of enthusiasm, but Herr Nohl has an intelligent appreciation of the greatness of his genius, and of the important influence of his work upon modern dramatic music, so that he gives us some genuine criticism along with his fine writing.”—Times, Philadelphia.

“It is a translation from the German of Louis Nohl, a writer who adds to literary tastes the familiarity with music which is especially desirably in the biography of a musical genius like Mozart. The brevity of the biography has not been secured at the expense of its style or of its fullness as a personal record—the former being clear, elegant and unambitious, and the latter a rounded and sympathetic outline of the incidents of Mozart’s brief and checkered life, particularly of those that exerted a formative or modifying influence upon his character as a man, or upon the development of his genius as an artist.”—Harper’s Monthly.

Sold by all booksellers, or mailed, postpaid, on receipt of price by the publishers,

A. C. McCLURG & COMPANY,
Cor. Wabash Ave. and Madison St., Chicago.

“A vivid picture of his life.”—The Nation.

---

LIFE OF BEETHOVEN.

From the German of Dr. Louis Nohl. With portrait.
Price, $1.00.

“It gives in small compass a sympathetic and successful picture of the struggles and successes of this great but melancholy genius.”—Christian Advocate, New York.

“In this book there is much for music students to linger over, and those who love to follow the great masters’ career will find this story of the life of the greatest of them all peculiarly fascinating. No student can fully understand the great works of musical art until he knows and can sympathize with the inner nature of the worker.”—Musical Visitor, Cincinnati.

“Nohl has a devoted love for the great composer and musician, and this he most beautifully imparts to his enthusiastic tribute, which is, nevertheless, a carefully written and just biography.”—Home Journal, Boston.

“The biography is accurate, and it has the especial value of connecting each one of Beethoven’s important works quite clearly with the circumstances and moods under which it was composed. It meets the purpose of a popular biography unusually well.”—Times, Philadelphia.

“The reader of this biography will stand in awe before the transcendent genius of the grand artist, and sorrowfully remember how poorly he was compensated for his great services during the sorrowful years of his life upon the earth. The book is one of absorbing interest, clearly and concisely written, and deserving of an honored place in every library.”—Inter Ocean, Chicago.

“How he lived and moved and acted in the flesh, and his successive trials, triumphs, and crowning glories are set forth in this acceptable volume with accuracy, graphic power, and most interesting particularity of detail. Whosoever hath music in his soul will read the work with avidity.”—Evening Post, San Francisco.

Sold by all booksellers, or mailed, postpaid, on receipt of price by the publishers,

A. C. McCLURG & COMPANY,
Cor. Wabash Ave. and Madison St., Chicago.

“A well told story of a romantic life.”—Philadelphia Inquirer.

---

LIFE OF HAYDN.

From the German of Dr. Louis Nohl, by George P. Upton. With portrait. Price, $1.00.

“While this biography is scholarly in a musical as well as literary sense, it is yet so full of anecdote, and so bright in its social sketches, as to be wholly interesting, and makes a capital book to be read by musical students as well as by those who thirst for general intelligence.”—Christian Advocate, New York.

“A pleasant and vivid series of portraits of Haydn as child, youth and student, man and artist, that linger lovingly in the reader’s mind long after the book is thrown aside. The work treats his life in detached epochs, and is devoted to the discussion of the results attained and their effect upon the musical world to-day. It is a handy little volume, alike in price, size, and character, and is pretty sure of meeting the popular demand.”—Post, Boston.

“A highly interesting picture of the genial, sensitive, and lovable man, and a critically appreciative account of his career as a composer. . . . No fuller history of his career, the society in which he moved and of his personal life can be found than is given in this work.”—Gazette, Boston.

“It is an admirable translation, and records in simple style the story of the genial musician and lovable man, still known, after almost a century’s elapse, among his own people by the endearing appellation of ‘Papa.’”—Express, Buffalo.

“Dr Nohl’s Life of Haydn, translated from the German by George P. Upton, we cordially recommend as an excellent translation of a standard work, certain to interest and serve the music student. Dr. Nohl’s biography is unique in respect to the strongly personal and private insight into Haydn the man, it affords us. Few artistic natures have been so well balanced, so pure and single in aim, and are worthier of study. . . . It is a book to be praised and welcomed in English dress.”—Independent, New York.

Sold by all booksellers, or mailed, postpaid, on receipt of price by the publishers,

A. C. McCLURG & COMPANY,
Cor. Wabash Ave. and Madison St., Chicago.

“A worthy companion to the other biographies of Dr. Nohl.”—Musical Visitor, Cincinnati.

---

LIFE OF WAGNER.

From the German of Dr. Louis Nohl, by George P. Upton. With portrait. Price $1.00.

“The translation is excellent. The portrait of Wagner included in this book is the finest we have seen. The face looks inspired.”—Boston Globe.

“Herr Nohl’s biography is terse, concise, enthusiastic, and at the same time just. Anyone who wishes to get a clear idea of the ‘Music of the Future’ and Wagner’s life work will do well to read this volume.”—Philadelphia Press.

“It is a very concise biography, and gives in vigorous outlines those events of the life of the tone-poet which exercised the greatest influence upon his artistic career, his youth, his early studies, his first works, his sufferings, disappointments, his victories. It is a story of a strong life devoted to lofty aims.”—Baltimore American.

“So well considered and discriminating a record of his life as is here presented by Dr. Nohl, has something of value, therefore, for all classes of readers. . . . Careful analyses of Wagner’s compositions are essential portions of the story, and are so skillfully accomplished as to give additional value to the book.”—Buffalo Express.

“It gives the story of Wagner’s career with all necessary detail; traces the influences under which his works were produced, and analyzes with perspicuity his various masterpieces. . . . The volume is one that every lover of music may read with advantage, for it provides a very clear idea of the mission which the composer sought to fulfill.”—Literary World, Boston.

“Dr. Nohl’s Biographies of Musicians consist of the Lives of MOZART, BEETHOVEN, HAYDN, LISZT, and WAGNER—

5 volumes, in box, Cloth.	Price,	-	$5 00
5 “ “ half Calf.	“	-	12 50

Sold by all booksellers, or mailed, postpaid, on receipt of price by the publishers,

A. C. McCLURG & COMPANY,
Cor. Wabash Ave. and Madison St., Chicago.

"An enthusiastic biography of the great musical magician of to-day."—Christian Union, New York.

---

LIFE OF LISZT.

From the German of Dr. Louis Nohl, by George P. Upton. With portrait. Price, $1.00.

"It is a most interesting and instructive volume, the only biography of Liszt, in English, which has appeared thus far in this country. We recommend it to all lovers of music."—Musical World, Cleveland.

"It is more than a mere biography of the great musician; it is a comprehensive, sympathetic review of his personal and musical characteristics, and is a thoroughly entertaining volume from beginning to end."—Post, Boston.

"This volume is the fifth in the 'Biographies of Musicians,' by the same author, and is treated in that finished and polished style of criticism and review which characterises his preceding volumes. The book is prepared with a fine, clean cut engraving of Liszt."—Post, San Francisco.

"In this Life of Liszt, Dr. Nohl had an attractive subject for a musical enthusiast. * * It is refreshed by incident and narrative, and is not overweighted by a too subtle analysis which a musical critic is often tempted to make, especially when dealing with such a phenomenon as Liszt."—Christian Register, Boston.

"This biography of the 'Hungarian Wonder Child' is written with great simplicity and in perfect taste. Very interesting mention is made of the gypsies and how strongly these children of nature with their one art of music impressed Liszt as boy and man. He visited them in their out-door kingdom, slept with them under the open heavens, played with the children, made presents to the maidens, gossiped with their chiefs, and listened to their gypsy orchestras. At the age of twelve, he was, as a pianist, without a rival, and extraordinary as a composer. This biography is wholly successful in all that it undertakes to portray. A strong idea is formed in the mind of the reader of the might of his genius and the beauty of his character."—Herald, Boston.

Sold by all booksellers, or mailed, post-paid, on receipt of price, by the publishers.

A. C. McCLURG & COMPANY,

Cor. Wabash Ave. and Madison St., Chicago.

"Stirring events are graphically told in this series of romances."—Home Journal, New York.

TIMES OF GUSTAF ADOLF.

AN HISTORICAL ROMANCE OF THE EXCITING
'TIMES OF THE THIRTY YEARS' WAR.

FROM THE ORIGINAL SWEDISH.

BY Z. TOPELIUS.

12mo, extra cloth, black and gilt. Price 75 cents.

"A vivid, romantic picturing of one of the most fascinating periods of human history."—The Times, Philadelphia.

"Every scene, every character, every detail, is instinct with life. * * From beginning to end we are aroused, amused, absorbed."—The Tribune, Chicago.

"The author has a genuine enthusiasm for his subject, and stirs up his readers' hearts in an exciting manner. The old times live again for us, and besides the interest of great events, there is the interest of humble souls immersed in their confusions. 'Scott, the delight of glorious boys,' will find a rival in these Surgeon Stories."—The Christian Register, Boston.

"It is difficult to give an idea of the vividness of the descriptions in these stories without making extracts which would be entirely too long. It is safe to say, however, that no one could possibly fail to be carried along by the torrent of fiery narration which marks these wonderful tales. * * Never was the marvelous devilry of the Jesuits so portrayed. Never were the horrors of war painted in more lurid colors."—The Press, Philadelphia.

"The style is simple and agreeable. * * There is a natural truthfulness, which appears to be the characteristic of all these Northern authors. Nothing appears forced; nothing indicates that the writer ever thought of style, yet the style is such as could not well be improved upon. He is evidently thoroughly imbued with the loftiest ideas, and the men and women whom he draws with the novelist's facility and art are as admirable as his manner of interweaving their lives with their country's battles and achievements."—The Graphic, New York.

Sold by all booksellers, or mailed postpaid, on receipt of price by the publishers.

A. C. McCLURG & COMPANY,
Cor. Wabash Ave. and Madison St., Chicago.

"Most exquisitely written and translated."

—Transcript, Boston.

TIMES OF BATTLE AND REST.

An Historical Romance of the Times of Charles X. and Charles XI. From the Swedish of Prof. Z. Topelius. (Vol. II. of "The Surgeon's Stories.") Price, 75 cents.

"One of the most absorbing and fascinating books we have ever read. Its literary work is as perfect as the subject matter."
—Home Journal, New York.

"It excels in exciting incidents, fascinative narration and striking delineations of events and characters with which it has to deal."
—Western Christian Advocate, Cincinnati.

"These historical romances are some of the best literary work of our time, and the excellent translation of the volume before us leaves nothing to be desired by the English reader."
Manhattan, New York.

"In the newly published second volume of Topelius' 'Surgeon's Stories' are to be praised the same wealth and originality of material and superior literary qualities which characterized the first cycle. The admirer of lofty romance cannot fail to be grateful for an introduction through this careful and spirited English version to the 'Scandinavian Scott,' as Professor Topelius has often been called. His works are glorious books for young people to read."
—Independent, New York.

"The second cycle of the 'Surgeon's Stories' covers the reigns of the Swedish kings Charles X. and Charles XI., and gives a stirring and graphic account of the conquests of the first in Poland and Denmark, with the famous march of his army across the ice of Little Belt in 1658, and the more peaceful but important events of the reign of the second, especially the Witchcraft persecutions and the great Reduction. Prof. Topelius deals with the rich material before him like a true master of historical romance. * * * He displays great versatility, combining vivacious narrative, historic fidelity, and ready humor."
Good Literature, New York.

Sold by all booksellers, or sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of price by the publishers,

A. C. McCLURG & COMPANY,
Cor. Wabash Ave. and Madison St., Chicago.

"Surely it is delightfully told."—Pioneer Press, St. Paul.

---

TIMES OF CHARLES XII.

An Historical Romance of the times of Charles XII. From the Swedish of Prof. Z. Topelius. (Vol. III. of "The Surgeon's Stories.") Price, 75 cents.

In this volume the admirable and popular series of "The Surgeon's Stories" has perhaps the richest subject in all Swedish history—the world-famous monarch, Charles XII., to whom Dr. Johnson applied his celebrated lines :

"He left the name at which the world grew pale,
To point a moral and adorn a tale."

"The work is the most brilliant in the series thus far, and imparts a knowledge of the history of the period in the most delightful manner."—Gazette, Boston.

"For strong and vivid scenes, dramatic power and effect, for novelty and enthusiastic interest, the stories are masterpieces. They ought to be read by every lover of fiction; they will reveal to him new and artistic work."—Boston Globe.

"All who enjoyed (and who that read it did not enjoy it?) 'The Times of Gustaf Adolf,' will be eager to read this the third of the series; a thrilling story of the thrilling times of 'The Lion of the North,' written by the Walter Scott of the North."

—Living Church, Chicago.

"We would much prefer teaching a youth Swedish history from the novels of Topelius than from any book of strict historical narrative. In the one case we are confident the events will be remembered and the times will live; in the other the chances are that the first will be forgotten and the second never realized."—New York Sun.

"We know of no author with whom to compare Topelius. He is vigorous and graphic, never verbose, never failing in interest. His books will attract the mature reader, and absorb the attention of children, and we commend them most heartily to all of these classes."—Courier, Cincinnati.

Sold by all booksellers, or sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of price, by the publishers,

A. C. McCLURG & COMPANY,
Cor. Wabash Ave. and Madison St., Chicago.

"Swedish history has never been so attractively recorded."—Advance, Chicago.

---

TIMES OF FREDERICK I.

An Historical Romance of the period succeeding the reign of Charles XII. From the Swedish of Prof. Z. Topelius.
(Vol. IV. of "The Surgeon's Stories.") Price, 75 cents.

---

"The portrayal is that of a master hand, and the stirring tale of passion, the thread of the king's ring romance, running through it make a captivating and intensely thrilling production of literary genius."—Times, Troy, N. Y.

"The 'Times of Frederick I.' is wholly worthy the companionship of its predecessors. The characters are drawn with much of the picturesque force of Walter Scott, and the narrative is almost as animated and as genial as that of the elder Dumas in his historical novels."—Gazette, Boston.

"Even more than former volumes does this book show a striking resemblance to Scott in the power to make an historical epoch real and vivid to the reader's eyes. There is nothing finer in Scott than the scene in which the young count discovers the woman whom he loves in the wayside inn, surrounded by drunken noblemen, and rescues her by fighting three duels with the carousers."—Chronicle, San Francisco.

"Its chief value is in its graphic description of the political feeling and action in the first years of peace after the war of twenty-one-years, and in its very perfect photographs of three leaders, Count Horn, Count Bertelskold, and Larsson. There are present, with undiminished force, the same knowledge of men and motives, the same skillful art and eloquent expression that have been exhibited so remarkably in the preceding works. The stories are classic in theme, treatment and style, and afford a satisfaction to literary taste that it seldom experiences in their class of fiction. Their qualities are entitled to conscientious study, and the time given to them will be repaid by the discovery of some rare beauties."—Globe, Boston.

Sold by all booksellers, or sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of price, by the publishers,

A. C. McCLURG & COMPANY,
Cor. Wabash Ave. and Madison St., Chicago.

"It deserves a place with the very best fiction."

—Standard, Chicago.

---

TIMES OF LINNÆUS.

An Historical Romance of the Times of the great Naturalist Linnæus. From the Swedish of Prof. Z. Topelius. (Vol. V. of "The Surgeon's Stories.") Price, 75 cents.

---

"Like its predecessors, the work bears a romantic charm and beauty of style that is rarely exceeded even in unmixed fiction."—Interior, Chicago.

"The freshness, purity, and learning which have given these stories their exceptional reputation are all present in the latest. For the lover of flowers and plants this is as enjoyable as a romance of botany, without any unnecessary intrusion of unknown terms."—Herald, Chicago.

"The beauty, delicacy and tenderness of description in these stories can only be compared to the work of Sir Walter Scott. The subtle emotions of the human mind are sketched with a master hand. The heroic element combines the courage of a soldier, with the gentleness of a lover. The reader is tempted to exclaim in rapture, 'Why have we never known this people before?'"—Free Press, Detroit.

"In the other four stories, Topelius has described part of the political as well as the social history of Sweden, and we have learned some things no other history has taught us, about the splendid campaigns of Gustaf Adolf and Charles the XII., but the author in the Times of Linnæus, introduces us to far nobler battle fields, and to a conqueror whose name is, and forever will be, held in love and admiration by the students of natural science. As we follow with uninterrupted interest the course of this story, we are more than ever impressed with the clear, picturesque and dramatic style of its author. He records the history and character of the great naturalist, and at the same time portrays the romance of human passion with a skill which few modern novelists possess. We have on other occasions advised our readers to buy these stories. We more decidedly than ever before repeat this counsel."—Courier, Cincinnati.

Sold by all booksellers, or sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of price by the publishers,

A. C. McCLURG & COMPANY,
Cor. Wabash Ave. and Madison St., Chicago.

"The completion of 'The Surgeon's Stories' forms an event in modern literature."—Express, Buffalo.

---

TIMES OF ALCHEMY.

An Historical Romance of the Dawn of the Gustavian Period of Swedish History. From the Swedish of Prof. Z. Topelius. (Vol. VI., and last of "The Surgeon's Stories.") Price, 75 cents.

---

"As abundant in charm as the delightful historical romances of the elder Dumas."—Gazette, Boston.

"This volume completes a charming series of stories, possessing not merely fine fancy, but having within them such faithful pictures of northern European life as can be found in no other books."—Christian Advocate, Chicago.

"Perhaps in knowledge of the quiet expression of the heart, under influence of love, and in the beauty of its lessons, this is superior to all. * * They may be classed among the best books of contemporary fiction, and should be carefully read."—Globe, Boston.

"The first conclusion—the only one (for who can criticise so charming a series as this has been?)—is that there is not quite enough 'Alchemy,' for what there is makes us want more—in the unpretentious little book. But it is a clever wind up, nevertheless, of an exceedingly clean and clever series, for the introduction of which the publishers deserve large credit."—Pioneer-Press, St. Paul.

In the concluding volume of these great romances we are shown a striking picture of the superstition that prevailed amongst all classes of Swedish society before its clouds had yet been penetrated and dissolved by the sunlight of exact science that followed the career of Linnæus. This superstition is exemplified in the person of a mysterious alchemist and his experiments in search of the philosopher's stone and the elixir of life. Many of the characters of the preceding volume appear in this, and the threads of all the stories are here united and brought to a fitting close.

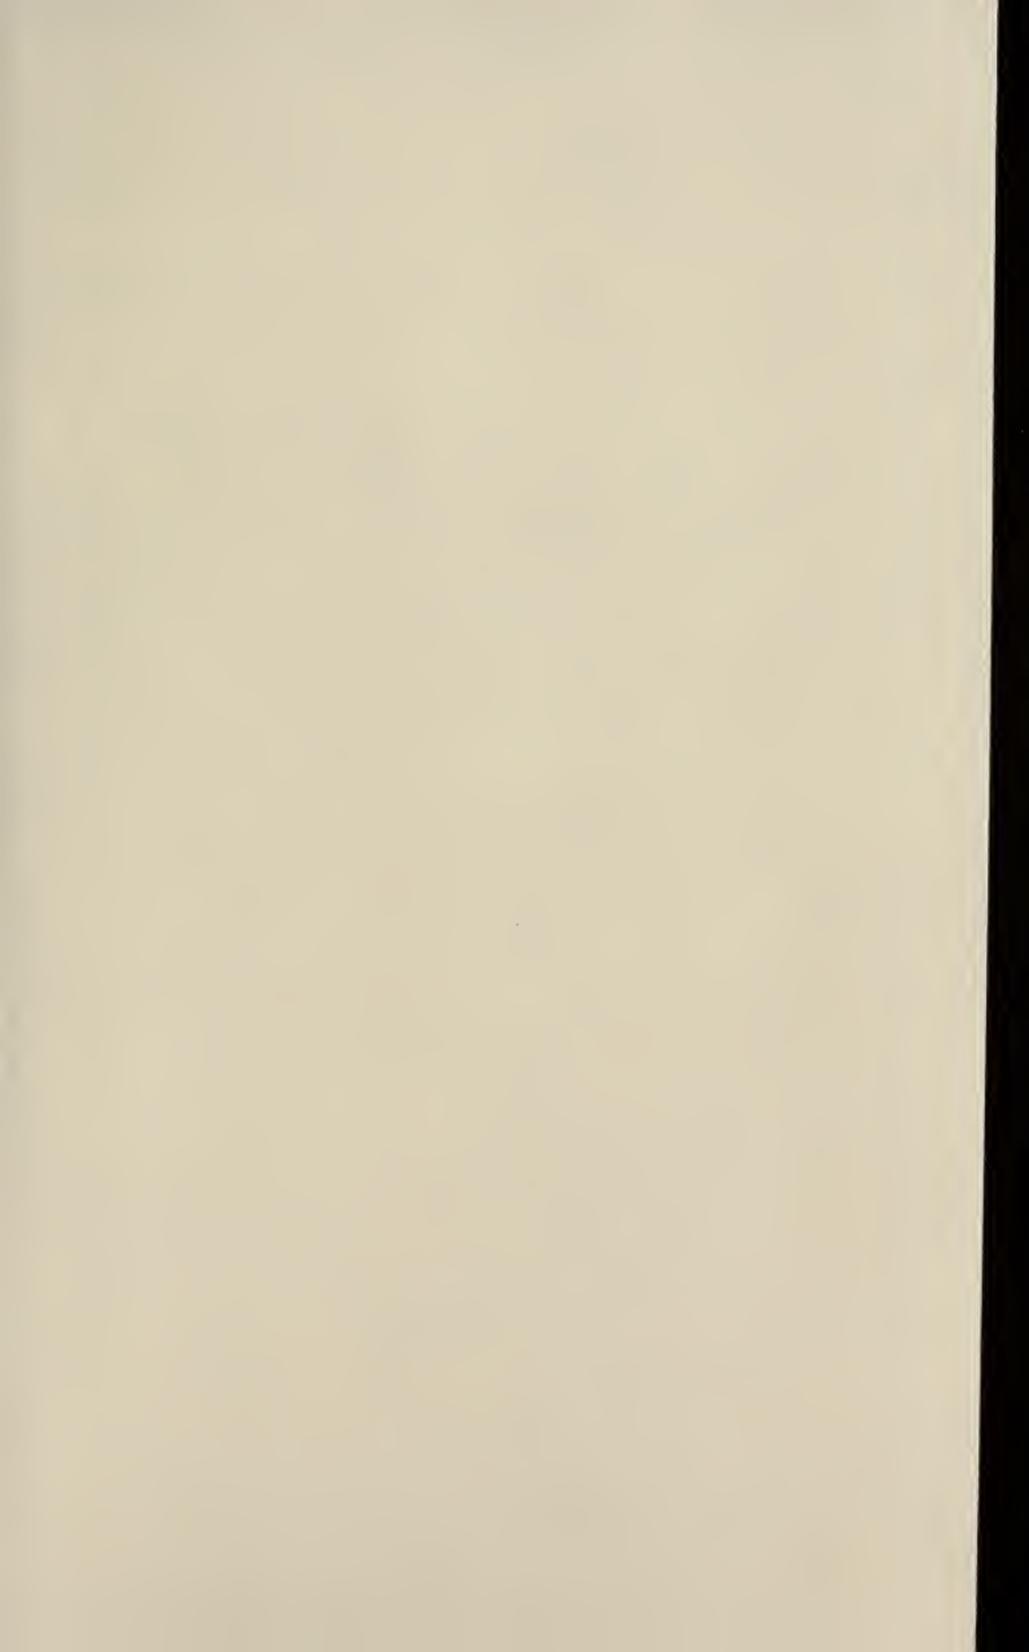

Sold by all booksellers, or sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of price by the publishers,

A. C. McCLURG & COMPANY,
Cor. Wabash Ave. and Madison St., Chicago.

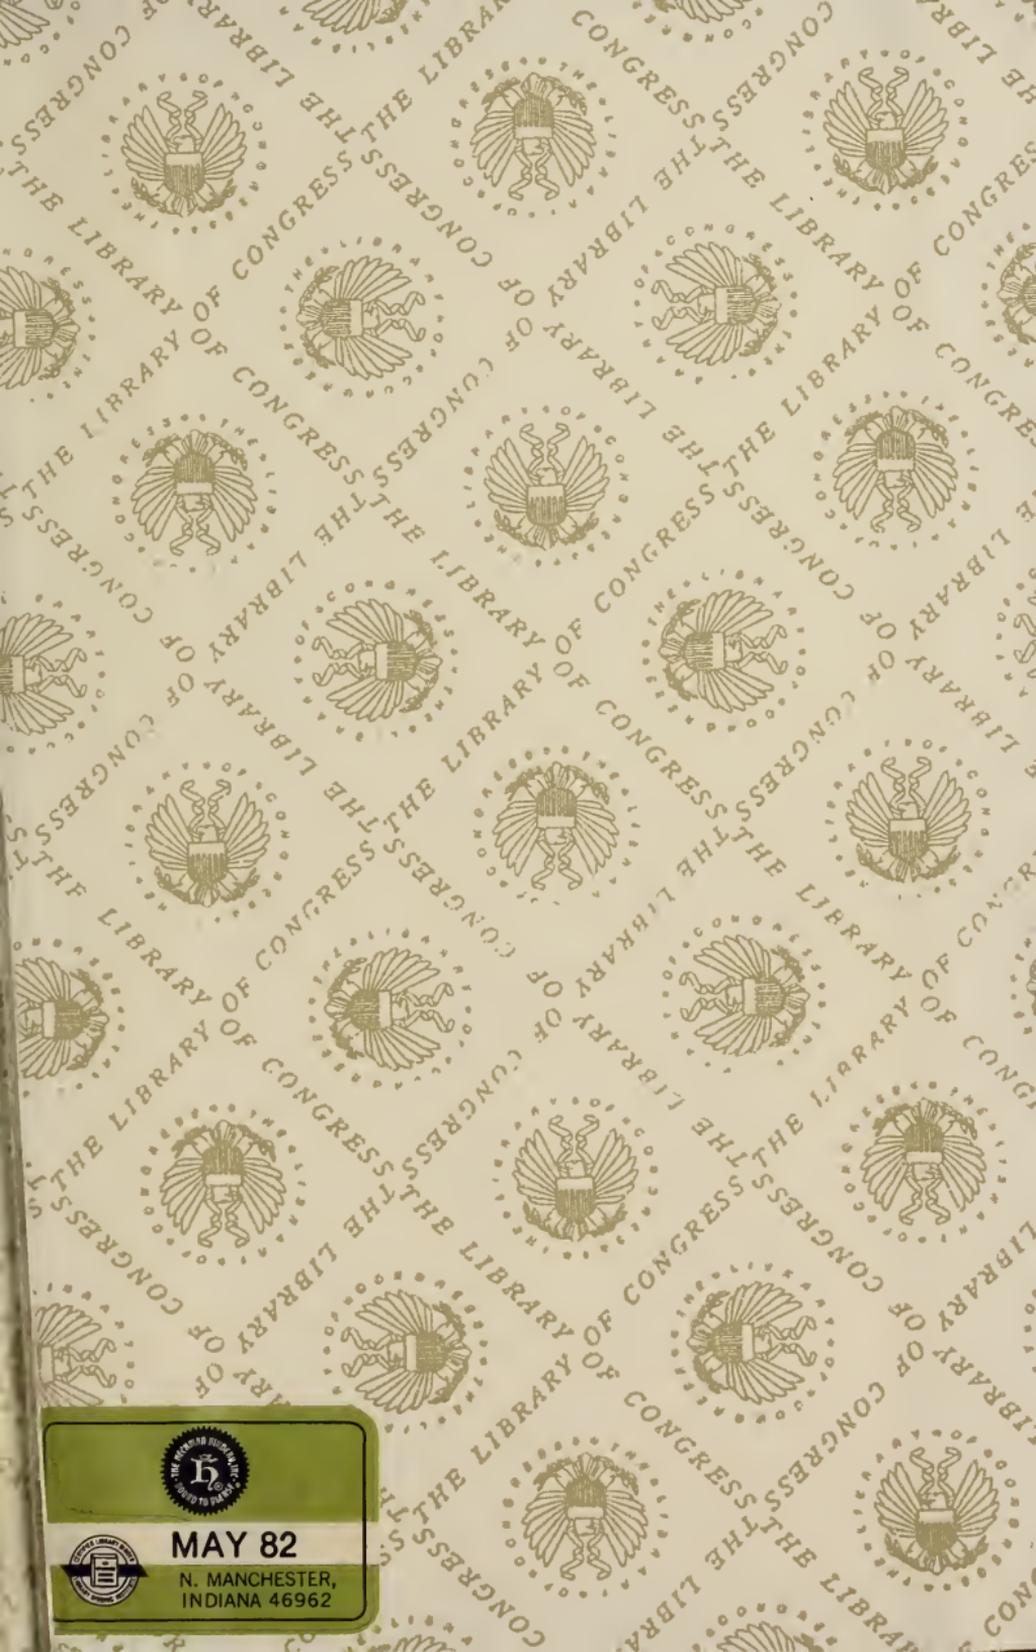

H 132 82

MAY 82

N. MANCHESTER,
INDIANA 46962

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS

0 021 899 104 A